It was not this transaction, however, which made Jessie's share of the subjects heritable. Her share was thereby enlarged, but the whole four shares were at that date heritable, as they had been at the truster's death; and Jessie's enlarged share, which is now directly in dispute, remained heritable at her death. It is upon these grounds, and not because of any supposed change upon the character of the estate operated by the deed of 1860, that I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I think it was not necessary to the result that the parties should elect not to sell. It was enough that they did not elect to sell under the discretionary power of sale conferred by the trust-deed, and so long as they did not do so the subjects remained heritable. If the right of all four had not been heritable prior to and at the date of the deed of 1860 a different kind of question would have arisen, which it is unnecessary here to consider.

LORD MURE.—The Lord Ordinary has dealt with two separate questions in No. 128. this case, first, whether the succession was moveable by force of the terms of the testator's settlement, and secondly, assuming it to have been moveable, whether it has been made heritable by the actings of the beneficiaries. On the first point his Lordship appears to have been of opinion that the interests of parties were moveable by the terms of the trust-deed. If it were necessary to separate the questions I should have had considerable hesitation in concurring with this view, and for these reasons : the deed contains no express direction to sell ; and it was not, I think, indispensable to the administration of the trust that there should be a sale. The fact that the property has been managed and enjoyed since 1858, without difficulty or dispute, and without having recourse to a sale, goes far to shew that sale was not indispensable. In the case of Auld v. Mabon, supra, p. 211, the question was raised as to the propriety of the trustees granting a pro indiviso right to the beneficiaries ; and it was held that that would be within the power of the trustees under the clause of the deed in that case. We have not exactly the same clause here, but I see no reason to doubt that the trustees had a discretion which would have entitled them to take that or any other course with a view to a division which they considered most advantageous for the beneficiaries.

June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

But, even assuming that the succession was moveable at the date of the testator's death, I concur in thinking that under the actings of the parties during the administration of the trust their respective interests were stamped with an heritable character ; and they have been so dealt with, more particularly at the date of the transaction with the sister who was married.

LORD SHAND.—I agree in thinking that this interlocutor should be adhered to, but I do not concur in all the grounds of judgment expressed in your Lordships' opinions. Every case of this kind, where we have to consider not only the construction of a deed, but the actings of parties afterwards, necessarily, in my opinion, raises two questions, first, whether the terms of the deed itself imply conversion ; secondly, whether the acts of the parties have made any change in the legal character of the estate as heritable or moveable to which they have acquired right as beneficiaries. In this case the second question is, assuming that the deed produced conversion, whether the succession is to be treated as converted because the parties have agreed to accept it in the form of heritage. That there must be two questions is apparent, because the first arises as soon as the trustor dies, and the answer to it cannot be affected by anything that is done afterwards. It is merely a question as to the effect of the deed. I do not express a confident opinion on the first question dealt with by the Lord Ordinary or what has fallen from your Lordships, but I am inclined to agree with his Lordship's view.

There is no doubt that the words, "divide the residue," do not necessarily imply conversion. But I think they rather indicate, when the subject is mixed estate, to be given in shares to a number of different objects, that conversion is to be presumed. Everything depends on the nature of the subject, and the number of the beneficiaries. When a trustor leaves two properties, a villa and garden, and a block of workmen's houses to be divided among four people, it is hardly to be suggested that they are to be divided in forma specifica. The exercise of the power of sale seems to be indispensable for the execution of the trust, unless indeed the parties enter into some special arrangement, such as here

No. 128.

June 7, 1877.

Hogg v.

Hamilton, &c.

occurred, and so avoid a sale. The provision that one sister, in this case, might get the property at a valuation, tells, I think, in favour of conversion, the arrangement contemplated being that one beneficiary was to take the property and the other three to get money. It is not said to have been decided by the recent case of Auld that in all circumstances a conveyance pro indiviso would satisfy a direction to divide, and I see no authority in that case for holding that in the present case the trustees would have been entitled, against the wishes of any one beneficiary, to convey the estate undivided, or that any single beneficiary would have had right, against the wishes of the others, to have a conveyance pro indiviso executed in favour of all.

But I think there is a clear ground of judgment upon which the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is rested. The ladies' actings amount to this, that the succession has been treated by them as heritage. They might have required the trust to be wound up, in which case, I think, there would have been realisation by sale and division, and so conversion. But they divided the money, and left the heritage untouched for several years, and when they came to settle with one of the sisters they did so on the footing that the heritable property was to remain with the others. In short, the case falls, I think, under the same principle as that of Grindlay, referred to by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—With permission of your Lordship, and my brother Lord Shand, I would wish to observe that it would be misleading the profession to affirm that he has done (inadvertently I presume), that all questions of conversion must be decided as at the trustee's death. A trite example, to the contrary, is a power of sale to trustees. If they sell under it, there is conversion. If they do not, there is none.

The defender's counsel moved that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered, in so far as it found the trustees liable in expenses, and they had stated no separate defence.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Recall the interlocutor in so far as it finds R. B. Tennent and A. Pollock, trustees of the deceased William Jamieson, liable in expenses: Quoad ultra adhere."

J. Y. GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 129.

June 8, 1877.

Duke of

Hamilton v.

Buchanan.

DUKE OF HAMILTON, Pursuer.—Gloag—Asher.
ANDREW BUCHANAN, Defender.—Fraser—Lorimer.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Missive Offer—Rei interventus.—In an action by a landlord against a tenant concluding for declarator that the defender was bound to execute a formal lease in terms of a written offer made by him for a farm, dated 12th September 1873, which had been followed by possession, otherwise that no valid contract of lease had been completed, it was proved that two written offers had been made by the tenant, dated respectively 14th August and 12th September, and that there was no written acceptance, and that the tenant had entered into possession of the farm in the belief that the terms of the lease were to include stipulations in the first as well as the second offer, while the landlord had given possession on the faith of the second offer alone.

Held that there having been no consensus in idem placitum there was no contract of lease.

1ST DIVISION.

Lord Rutherford Clark.

B.

SEQUEL of case reported supra, p. 328.

The proof allowed by the Court was taken before Lord Shand on 12th March, and the result of it sufficiently appears from his Lordship's opinion. The pursuer was allowed to add the following conclusion to the statement of facts:

mons :—" Or otherwise, and in the event of decree in terms of the foresaid conclusions or any of them not being pronounced it ought and should be found and declared by decree foresaid that no valid contract of lease of the said lands has been constituted, and that the defender has no right or title to possess the said lands;" and there was also a conclusion for removing. A plea was also added in terms of this conclusion.

No. 129.
June 8, 1877.
Duke of
Hamilton v.
Buchanan.

The defender was allowed to add this plea:—" The defender is not bound to enter into a lease in terms of the offer of 12th September 1873 alone, in respect (1) the defender's two offers of 14th August and 12th September 1873 are binding on the pursuer; or otherwise (2) if the offer of 14th August 1873 is not binding there is no contract between the parties."

Argued for the pursuer;—The result of the proof was to shew that the first offer never was accepted by the pursuer, and that possession was given on the second offer alone.

Argued for the defender;—The contract consisted of both offers. The proof shewed that the defender and the pursuer's factor both understood that these offers were to be taken together. At all events both these documents were in the possession of the landlord's factor, and he must be held to have acted on them.¹ If that were not so, there was so great a misunderstanding that the Court could not frame a lease without doing injustice to one or other of the parties.

At advising,—

LORD SHAND.—(After stating the conclusions of the summons and the averments of parties)—Substantially the question between the parties as presented in the original record is, whether, as maintained by the pursuer, the contract is to be found in the offer of 12th September and the conditions of let, or whether, as maintained by the defender, the three documents, viz, the letters of 14th August and 12th September and the conditions of let are to be taken together as containing the agreement between the parties. There was no written acceptance of the tenant's first offer any more than of the second. If there had been, the acceptance would have described the offer accepted, and there would have been a completed written contract. The possession which followed on the documents referred to is said to establish the contract. Both parties appeal to the ordinary rule of law that where possession follows upon a written offer the lease is effectual and binding on the terms expressed in the writing.

But when the parties met in Court it appeared that they were at variance, and had been so from the first, upon the question as to the writing or writings on the date of which possession was taken. The pursuer maintained that the possession followed upon the letter of the 12th September and the relative conditions; the defender, that it followed upon these and also upon the previous letter of 14th August.

The Lord Ordinary gave effect to the first of these contentions without proof, but upon a reclaiming note that interlocutor was recalled, and the parties were allowed a proof of their averments. I find in the report (p. 331) that your Lordship in the chair then stated—" The pursuer, therefore, hereby undertakes to prove that possession was given, and taken, and afterwards held under and in terms of the second offer, as distinguished from the first—in fact, that the possession was

¹ Carruthers v. Thomson, Feb. 11, 1836, 14 S. 464, 8 Scot. Jur. 302; Wilson v. Lord Breadalbane, 14th June 1859, 21 D. 957, 31 Scot. Jur. 525; Steuart's Trustees v. Hart, Dec. 2, 1875, ante, vol. iii. p. 192; Freeman v. Cook, July 11, 1848, 18 L. J. Exch. 114.

No. 129.

June 8, 1877.
 Duke of
 Hamilton v.
 Buchanan.

given and can be ascribed only to the latter offer. That averment, in point of fact, is absolutely essential to the success of the pursuer. On the other hand, he fairly enough represents in the next article that while that was his view, the defender's allegation was that the possession was specially referable to the offer of 14th August also, or to that offer alone."

The proof has been taken, and it only remains to be mentioned that in the course of the discussion which followed the pursuer has added an alternative conclusion and a plea in law to meet the case of its being now held that there was no concluded contract, while the defender has added a plea to a similar effect.

We have now to consider the result of the proof, and I shall state what seems to me to be its import. It appears that the farm was advertised in August 1873, and that the defender, having seen the advertisement, inspected the farm, and either in the course of that inspection or at its close had an interview with Mr Stewart Robertson, the Duke's chamberlain. At that interview the defender stated that there were certain things he would desire to have done if he became tenant, and he immediately afterwards sent to the chamberlain the offer of 14th August, to which allusion has been made. This letter, it is quite obvious contains special stipulations on matters which the pursuer thought were of importance. It was followed by an application for references, on the footing that it was to be submitted for consideration to the Duke of Hamilton's trustees. It was not returned to the defender, but was retained and has been produced by the pursuer. Afterwards there followed a letter requesting the tenant to attend a meeting at the chamberlain's office. The meeting took place upon 12th September, when the offer of that date was signed by the defender. The parties are not quite at one about what took place at that meeting, but it is clear that the business was very hurriedly transacted. Neither time nor opportunity was given or taken for discussion of the details of the lease. Mr Robertson's account of what took place is unsatisfactory. I am quite satisfied that at his examination he was ready to tell all he knew, but he had little if any recollection on the subject. The defender's account of the meeting shews that it was very hurried, and I am satisfied he is correct in saying that his offer of 14th August which led to his being there, was not even referred to.

After this meeting the tenant obtained possession. Mr Robertson says in his understanding was that possession was taken upon the last offer, while the tenant states that he would not have entered the farm on the terms of the last offer only, and that his act of possession had reference to both offers. Possession was given of the land under tillage at Martinmas 1873, and of the house six months thereafter at Whitsunday 1874. Before the latter of these dates Buchanan in conversation with the landlord's representative had referred to the offer of 14th August as an offer which he considered binding. It is important to notice this, and that Mr Barr (the cashier in the chamberlain's office) in his evidence expressly states that Buchanan in asking to have the byre altered, and other changes effected, did so as matter of right, and referred to his letter of 14th August. By a letter dated 30th April 1875 Barr acknowledged receipt of a copy of that very letter. It is quite apparent that before that time Buchanan was maintaining his right to a lease in terms of the offer of 14th August.

It thus appears from the evidence that when possession was given the landlord gave it upon the faith of the letter of 12th September, and of that letter and the general conditions of let of the estate alone. It is equally clear, not only from the tenant's own evidence, but from other sources of proof, that he possession on the faith of the previous offer in addition to the other documents above mentioned. There is no written contract, and possession is necessary in rebus, in order to make a completed binding agreement. But as possession was given on one footing and taken upon a totally different footing, as there was thus an essential misunderstanding in the acts of giving and taking possession, it appears to me that there is no concluded contract between parties. There is a want of that consensus ad idem which is necessary to complete an agreement.

It is maintained that the tenant having signed the latter offer, and having entered into possession after its date, must be held to be barred from pleading that he took possession upon any other. There is no absolute inconsistency, however, between the two offers, and a written acceptance might fairly have embraced both. In the first offer there are certain stipulations made for additional buildings, and that the existing buildings should be put into better condition. On the face of the articles of lease of the estates there is a provision indicating that there might be a separate agreement about the important matter of houses. The offer of the 14th August had been entertained and retained by the commissioner, and it was natural that the tenant should believe, as he says he did, at and after the hurried signing of 12th September, that both offers were to enter into the contract. In order to arrive at a different conclusion we must assume that on 12th September the tenant meant to give up, and gave up, all the stipulations he had made in his letter of the 14th August, and this without a word being said on the subject. There is nothing to shew that that is so, and it appears to me to be impossible to suppose, in the absence of any reason to the contrary, that he meant to take the farm upon these conditions; and there is no difficulty therefore in holding that he took possession upon the footing I have mentioned. It is unfortunate that the Lord did not draw the tenant's attention to the missive which was in his hands. It may reasonably be said it was for Mr Robertson to call the tenant's attention to the fact that his previous offer was to be entirely laid aside and superseded. On the other hand, the tenant cannot be acquitted of blame in having signed the second offer without inquiry as to the effect to be given to the first. It was complete in itself, and the defender should not have signed it without a clause relating into it his first offer.

It was suggested that the Court might still adjust a lease between the parties on the footing that a good deal had been already done to carry out the stipulations of the 14th August, and that there was evidence that others of them had departed from. But there is no averment and no plea to that effect. The pursuer has never taken up the position that some things had been done and others abandoned, and there is no proof upon that matter. There was evidence of the details of the transaction, including the actings of the defender and of the chamberlain, and of the servants of the Duke of Hamilton, but this was only admitted for the purpose of ascertaining how far the defender thought the stipulations he had made were material. If the evidence had shewn that he thought these stipulations immaterial, that fact would have gone far to shew that the defender did not think the offer of the 14th August important, or deem it part of the contract. Assuming that these stipulations were in his view part of the contract, nothing has subsequently occurred to deprive him of his right to have the offer made effectual; and if evidence of actings had been offered, in order to enable the Court now to settle a lease on that footing, giving up these stipulations, I would have rejected it, as dealing with a matter which had not been brought to probation.

No. 129.

June 8, 1877.
Duke of
Hamilton v.
Buchanan.

No. 129.

June 8, 1877.
Duke of
Hamilton v.
Buchanan.

In this case, which I take to be a very special one, it is clear, on the whole, that possession was given and taken upon different views held by the two parties respectively, and so under a mutual misunderstanding. I think it follows that there is no valid or binding contract of lease. I therefore am of opinion that decree should be given in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons to that effect. With regard to the conclusion for removing, which must also receive effect, it would be desirable that it should if possible be made the subject of arrangement without further litigation. The defender having laid down the crops of the present year must be allowed to reap them. There are mutual claims to be adjusted, for rent on the one hand, and beneficial expenditure of a permanent nature on the land on the other, and all these matters would very properly form the subject of a judicial reference.

LORD DEAS.—As Lord Shand has said, this is a peculiar case, which can hardly be a precedent for any other. In ordinary circumstances, if there are documents of any kind between landlord and tenant shewing the subject let, the rent, and the endurance of the lease, and possession has followed, a lease may be framed at the sight of the Court.

But the peculiarity here is, that there are two documents, either of which, if it had existed alone and been followed by possession, would have founded a good claim for a lease. There is a further peculiarity that these two documents are inconsistent with each other. A lease might be framed on either of them, or both combined. Both of these documents were in the possession of the landlord's chamberlain when his interview with the tenant took place. One was shown before the parties, and the other was hanging on a file in the chamberlain's office, and it was in these circumstances that we allowed a proof, to endeavour to ascertain whether possession had followed on both, or on either of these documents.

To say the least of it, the landlord's chamberlain went very loosely to work. I do not question the candour of his testimony, but he has no distinct or reliable recollection of what passed at the interview between him and the tenant, and it seems to me impossible to say that there was any specific bargain between the parties to which effect can now be given. There seems to have been, on the contrary, an entire misunderstanding on the subject, for which both parties have been to blame; and, I think, the only thing we can do, with any effect, is to give effect to the declaratory conclusions of the summons, to the effect of finding that there was no concluded bargain.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The great peculiarity of this case is, that there were two offers made for the farm by the intending tenant, neither of which was accepted or rejected in writing. Accordingly, the two offers, standing together, were a proposal or proposals on the part of the tenant, and nothing more. In order to convert these, or either of them, into a complete and binding contract, it was necessary that possession should follow. Nothing else could give effect to this one side of an inchoate contract. Possession did follow, but the question is, on which of the offers did it follow, for neither was accepted and neither was rejected? The landlord says that it followed on the second offer, which view superseded the first offer. The tenant says that possession followed on both offers, that neither was rejected, and that both are necessary to the completion of his right.

The object of allowing a proof was to endeavour to ascertain which of the two was true—whether the possession had reference to the one offer or to both. The result is, to shew that the landlord's representative ascribed the possession to one offer, the latter of the two, and believed that the tenant was acting on the same understanding. The tenant, on the other hand, ascribed the possession to both offers, and believed that the landlord's representative understood he was doing so. If I disbelieved the statements of either party I could then see no way to hold that there was a concluded contract, as I could then decide in either view I was to give credence. But I am in the position of believing both to be perfectly honest. I think the landlord or his representative forgot at the first offer, and I am just as ready to believe that the tenant had both in his mind, and regarded both as of importance. The legal inference from that statement of fact is irresistible. There was no consensus in idem placitum, and therefore no mutual contract was concluded. The contract is said to have been completed not by writing alone, but by writing on one side, followed by possession on the other. But the possession here is ambiguous as to be no substitute for writing. On that state of the facts the legal inference is that there was no contract. I therefore concur with yourships that we ought to give decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons.

No. 129.

June 8, 1877.
Duke of
Hamilton v.
Buchanan.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors :—

5th June 1877.—“ Find, declare, and decern, in terms of the second (alternative) declaratory conclusion of the summons as amended, and appoint parties to be heard on the conclusions for removing.”

4th July 1877.—“ Decern in terms of the conclusion of removing, and, of consent of both parties, fix the terms of removing at the terms of Martinmas 1877 as to the arable land, and Whitsunday 1878 as to the houses and grass, reserving to the defender all claims which may be competent to him in the premises in connection with his possession of the farm of Flemington, and decern, and find no expenses due.”

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—H. & A. INGLIS, W.S.—Agents.

AND N. LOCKHART, Pursuers and Appellants.—M'Laren—Johnston.

MOODIE AND COMPANY, Defenders and Respondents.—Trayner—

M'Kechzie.

ROBERT MACKENZIE, Defender.

No. 130.

June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

Partnership—Joint Adventure—Sale.—A and B entered into a joint adventure to purchase, bleaching, and resale of 10,000 spindles of yarn. A authorised purchase the yarn at a price not exceeding 1s. 11d. per spindle. B then used the yarn at 1s. 11½d. in his own name from L, and granted bills for the without disclosing to him the existence of the joint adventure. An action brought against A for the price, after B had become bankrupt, that A was liable to L for the price to the extent to which he had authorised to pay for the yarn—(disc. Lord Mure, who held on the evidence that purchased the yarn from L on his own individual credit, and had then run into the joint adventure as his contribution, and that A was not liable for the price).

An action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Dundee by N. and N. 1ST DIVISION.
Part, flax-spinners, Kirkcaldy, against D. Moodie and Company, Sheriff of For-fers, Dundee, and Robert Mackenzie, merchant, Dundee, concluding farshire.
M.

No. 130. for payment of £992, being the price of 10,240 spindles of yarn, at 1s. 11½d. per spindle. Mackenzie, who had become bankrupt, did not defend the action.
 June 8, 1877.
 Lockhart v.
 Moodie & Co.

The pursuers stated that they sold the yarns in question to Mackenzie on 8th February 1875, on account of a joint adventure previously agreed on between him and Moodie and Company, and that Mackenzie granted a promissory-note at four months for the price, but before the promissory-note was payable he became bankrupt, and the promissory-note was dishonoured.

The defenders, Moodie and Company, stated that Mr Mackenzie agreed to supply the yarns to the joint adventure at the price of 1s. 11½d. per spindle; that they, in settlement of this agreed-on price, granted two bills on 11th and 17th February 1875 to Mackenzie; and that these bills were discounted, and the proceeds received by him. Moodie and Company further stated that they had paid and retired these bills.

Moodie and Company pleaded;—There having been no bargain or transaction between the pursuers and the present defenders, or any one acting on their behalf, either as partners of the joint adventure mentioned in the foregoing defences, or otherwise in relation to the yarns specified in the account sued for, the defenders are entitled to absolver, with expenses.

A proof was led in the Sheriff Court. The facts proved fully appear from the opinions of the Judges, particularly from the opinion of Lord Deas.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds as matters of fact (1) that the yarns mentioned in the account annexed to the summons were sold by the pursuers at the rate specified in the said account to Mr Robert Mackenzie, a defender in this action, against whom decree in absence has of this date been pronounced, and that the price has not been paid; but (2) that the pursuers have failed to prove that in purchasing the said yarns the defender, Mr Robert Mackenzie, was acting for or on behalf of a joint adventure entered into between him and the other defenders, Messrs D. Moodie and Company, as alleged in the summons: Finds, therefore, as matter of law, that the defenders, Messrs D. Moodie and Company, are not liable to the pursuers for price of said yarns, but are entitled to be absolved from the conclusions of the action: absolves them therefrom accordingly: Finds them entitled to expenses" &c.

The Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) adhered.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The result of the evidence was to shew that the purchase was made on account of the joint adventure. It did not matter that Lockhart and Company relied solely on the credit of Mackenzie in selling. If the purchase was made for behoof of the joint adventure all the joint adventurers were liable in solidum.¹

Argued for the defenders, Moodie and Company;—Mackenzie made the purchase on his own account alone. Moodie and Company were not liable unless they expressly authorised the purchase. Joint adventure and partnership differed in so far that one joint adventurer must have the express authority of the other in order to bind him effectually. If Mackenzie had made the purchase on behalf of the joint adventure there w.

¹ Logy v. Durham, Dec. 30, 1697, M. 14,566; Gouthwaite v. Duckworth, June 1, 1810, 12 East, 421; White v. M'Intyre, Jan. 12, 1841, 3 D. 334. Scot. Jur. 145; Cunningham v. Kinnear, March 27, 1765, 2 Paton's A. 114; British Linen Company v. Alexander, Jan. 14, 1853, 15 D. 277, 25 S. Jur. 180; 2 Bell's Com. (5th ed.), 649, 651.

reason why he should not have disclosed it, as at the time he was in No. 130. and credit. The difference of price shewed that the purchase was not the joint adventure.

June 8, 1877.
 Lockhart v.
 Moodie & Co.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—Moodie and Company on the one hand, and Mackenzie on the other, were traders in Dundee, but with the exception of two successive joint ventures in yarns they do not appear to have been connected in business. The yarns on both occasions were what are favourably known in the trade as Lockhart's spin, and were purchased by Mackenzie from Messrs Lockhart, who were spinners in Kirkcaldy. The first transaction was in October 1874, and the first account was entered in the books of Moodie and Company as relating to 3000 spindles. In that account, under the head "from whom purchased," they have "N. and N. Lockhart per Rob. Mackenzie, on joint account with him." It is clear that the next transaction, which is the one now in dispute, was understood, both by Moodie and Company and Mackenzie, to be a transaction of the same kind, and under the same conditions as the transaction of 1874. They have that under the hand of Mackenzie in the memorandum of 11th February 1875. "Dundee, 11th February 1875.—I wait on you with (1) Duplicate of order which I have sent to N. B. R. Co. for yarn from Lockhart; (2) Comment invoice on joint a/c. of yarn covered by above order; (3) Statement of account shewing due to me by joint a/c. £480, 8s. 8d.; (4) My draft on your selves for that sum, which be good enough to accept and return to me. These are all in accordance with arrangements as carried out last time, excepting Mr M. (as he explained to you) has not been able to arrange an extra $\frac{1}{2}\%$." At this time Mackenzie had made a purchase of the yarns from Lockhart, and ordered them to be sent to him by the North British Railway. But they never actually came into Mackenzie's possession. When they were at the station in Dundee he sent this notice:—"Dundee, 11th February 1875.—Please deliver to Messrs D. Moodie and Company the whole of the yarn lying with you on my account from Messrs N. and N. Lockhart, Kirkcaldy.—ROBT. MACKENZIE." The yarns were sent in separate parcels, but were all delivered by the railway company to Moodie, who managed both transactions for himself and his partner, and, as the two had only one share between them, it will simplify the statement to treat of Mackenzie and Moodie as the two joint adventurers. The deliveries were made in parcels in the same way as in 1874. "Dundee, 17th October 1875.—Lockhart has sent on our joint a/c. 3072 sps. $3\frac{1}{2}$ -lbs. tow, which I have directed the railway company to deliver to you." But on the second occasion there was no entry at all in the books of Moodie and Company of any purchase of yarn from Mackenzie. The only explanation given of this is that it was an omission.

It is true, however, that neither on the first nor on the second occasion was Mackenzie made aware that Moodie or Moodie and Company had anything to do with the purchase. Lockhart trusted entirely to the credit of Mackenzie. The facts are clear, but the question of liability is one of law. We have the law very fully laid down by Mr Bell in the second volume of his Commentaries, 5th ed. p. 649. Speaking of joint adventure as a limited partnership he says,—“If parties have formed their agreement, and arranged their joint interest, and the adventure authorise goods to be purchased, they will be liable for the price. It is a purchase by the society, whatever credit may

No. 130.
June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

have been relied on. This is the settled doctrine both of Scottish and of English law." For English law, he refers to what was thus laid down by Lord Ellenborough:—"If all agree to share in goods to be purchased, and in consequence of that agreement one of them go into the market and make the purchase, it is the same for this purpose (responsibility) as if the names had been announced to the seller, and therefore all are liable for the value of them." There is, indeed, no doubt about the law, and there is nothing to the contrary in the opinion which has been referred to of Lord Fullerton in White v. M'Intyre, 3 D. 334. In that case there was a purchase of ground by one party, who afterwards sold it to another and they then entered into a joint adventure, which was not to consist in the building of houses on the ground, but in the profit or loss which might result from selling the houses after they were built. One of the parties undertook to build the houses for a fixed sum of £4000, and he entered into contracts with third parties for the erection of the houses, and, inter alia, into a contract for the brick work. His profit or loss on the building contract had nothing to do with the joint adventure in regard to a subsequent sale of the houses, and the case does not at all infringe on the general law of joint adventure as stated by Mr Bell.

In the present case, however, it is said that on the second occasion (and the same must be said as to the first occasion also) Mackenzie first purchased, and then sold to Moodie. No such transaction was entered in the books, and that is not the construction which the law must put on the facts. There is no doubt of the material facts as appearing upon the documents. The joint adventure was agreed upon before Mackenzie purchased from Lockhart. It had not only been talked about, but finally agreed upon. The joint adventure was to be a purchase of "Lockhart's spin," and that Mackenzie should go into the market and purchase it. I am quite aware that there is some discrepancy in the evidence as to whether the joint adventure had been finally adjusted before the purchase, but I hold the import of the proof to be that it had not only been previously agreed that there should be a joint adventure, but also what the subject of the joint adventure should consist of, and by which of the joint adventurers it should be purchased. All this I think had been fixed before the purchase was made. This was not the case of a co-adventurer contributing what he had, and the other contributor or co-adventurer contributing something else. It is a conclusive fact in the case that the yarn was to be and actually was the whole subject-matter of the joint adventure. The expense of bleaching and otherwise finishing the yarn was to be borne by the joint adventurers, and their profit was to consist in the advance of price which would be got for it when so bleached and finished. I do not think it is in Moodie's mouth to say that he dealt with the yarn as a purchase from Mackenzie. He had no right to deal with it. That would have been to give him a chance of profit upon the yarn of Lockhart, or of whoever might have been the direct seller, without incurring any responsibility to that seller for the price. There may have been here an innocent mistake on Moodie's part as to the law; very possibly there was so. But the policy of the law is opposed to the facilities for fraud which non-liability to the seller in such a case would afford.

The only puzzle in the case has arisen from the fact that Mackenzie purchased the yarns from Lockhart at one farthing per spindle more than the price at which Moodie debited himself and his partner in settling with Mackenzie.

The Sheriff-substitute says, in his very distinct note, that but for this difference of a farthing per spindle he would have decided for the pursuer. The difference is, however, of no importance, except in its bearing upon the question whether there was a separate and independent sale by Mackenzie to Moodie. At first sight there appears to be something in it as touching that point, but the yarn was not entered in the books as a purchase from Mackenzie, and the more we look into the circumstances the less important the difference of price becomes. Moodie would not go into the transaction unless the yarn could be got at 1s. 11d. per spindle, fearing no doubt that a higher price would not leave a profit. Mackenzie was plainly very anxious, for his own purposes, that the joint adventure should go on. He was obviously in want of money, and by the transaction, as it was arranged, he got bills which he could and did discount, and by the renewal thereof he kept himself in funds, leaving his bill to Lockhart unpaid at the late when he became bankrupt. Rather than that the proposed joint adventure should be abandoned he chose to exceed his mandate by $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per spindle, which difference he thereby took upon himself.

On the whole, I am of opinion that this is a case of joint liability, although Lockhart certainly did not know of the joint adventure at the time of the purchase, or rely on the responsibility of Moodie and Company.

LORD MURE.—The difficulties of this case are upon the evidence ; but I do not think that there is much, if any, difficulty upon the law, which was in my opinion very distinctly laid down in the case of White v. M'Intyre to be this : that where goods are purchased by one member of a joint adventure on his individual credit and afterwards find their way into the joint adventure under a separate transaction, the fact that they have thus become in rem versum of the adventure will not of itself subject the other members of the adventure in liability if the goods can be shewn to be substantially the purchaser's contribution to the adventure. The opinion of Lord Fullerton in the case of White has been so referred to by both sides. But there were other opinions then delivered which appear to me to be of equal if not greater weight and more directly applicable to the present case. Thus, Lord President Hope, in a short but very distinct opinion, states the law as follows :—"There is no doubt that the work which forms the foundation of the action was in rem versum of the joint adventure. But then it was ordered by and furnished to Reid as an individual. It is not said that he pledged the credit of the company, nor even that he told at there was any joint adventure at all, or that the defender was any way concerned with the contract. If I buy goods on my own credit and afterwards use them for the purposes of a joint concern the seller's only claim is against me." Lord Gillies concurred with the Lord President, and referred to Mr Bell as an authority in support of his view (2 Com., p. 653), being a different passage from that just quoted by Lord Deas, Lord Mackenzie concurring on substantially the same grounds ; and there is one passage in Lord Fullerton's opinion which seems to me to point directly to the same result, where he says (p. 342),—"But there is another class of cases to which that principle will clearly not apply, which are the cases referred to by some of your Lordships, in which a party to a joint adventure has agreed to put into the common stock a certain quantity of goods or a certain sum of money, and in order to fulfil this agreement to his partners has a separate dealing with a third party in his own name and on his own credit, from whom he gets the goods or money. In such cases the individual partner is neither ostensibly nor really acting for the joint concern, as may be at once seen by considering that the joint adventure has no interest

No. 130.

June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

No. 130. whatever in the terms of that dealing. In such cases I think there is no principle for holding the socii jointly liable, as the dealing of the individual is not joint in point of law."

June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

The question we have to decide is whether the evidence in this case brings it within the rule thus authoritatively laid down in White's case. I am of opinion that it does, and I have not been able to come to the conclusion that the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute have taken a wrong view of the evidence for the transaction as disclosed in the proof appears to me to amount shortly to this: Mackenzie and Moodie having arranged to go into a joint adventure Mackenzie undertook to secure a certain quantity of yarn of "Lockhart's spin." He was to bring that in as his contribution to the joint adventure at a certain fixed price. But it was necessary before the yarn was resold that it should be bleached, and that, accordingly, Moodie, who was a bleacher, undertook to have done at his bleachworks. That, on the other hand, was his contribution to the concern, and the profits were to consist in the advance of price which was expected to be got from the yarn when sold, and were, as I understand, to be shared by the adventurers in proportion to their respective contributions. That was, I think, the subject-matter of the adventure, and it is very important to keep in view that Mackenzie might have bought Lockhart's yarn whenever he chose. If he could have got the yarn in Dundee he was not bound to go to Lockhart for it, and he might have bought it at any price, but was bound to put it into the joint adventure at 1s. 11d. per spindle. If he could not get the yarn at that price he was nevertheless bound to put it into the adventure at that price, and if he got it at a lower price the additional gain would be his. As the case turned out he in point of fact paid more than 1s. 11d. a spindle, and was a loser to that extent. Now, this price was paid by Mackenzie to Lockhart in the ordinary course of business as the full value of the goods at the time. He granted a bill at four months to Lockhart, and took payment from Moodie by a bill at three months. In that state of matters Lockhart knew nothing of Moodie, and dealt with Mackenzie on his individual credit, as he had done in the former transaction for the purchase of yarns by Mackenzie which were also the subject of a joint adventure with Moodie. As Mackenzie's bill had been paid in the former transaction Lockhart had no hesitation in again taking his bill, and the case, therefore, in this respect, comes under the ordinary rule of a sale of goods in which the seller trusts to the individual credit of the purchaser. Mackenzie here got the goods on his own credit and then sold them to the joint adventure, and that is just the case referred to by Lord President Hope. The goods no doubt never came into the actual possession of Mackenzie. But that arose from the fact that they were sent by railway to Dundee, and were then sent on by the railway company under Mackenzie's orders direct to Moodie's works, and does not, in my opinion, alter the character of the transaction. Neither does the fact that the joint adventure appears to have been arranged before the yarn was actually purchased, as in several of the cases cited the joint adventure had been arranged before the purchase was made by the joint adventurer on his own credit, notwithstanding which the joint adventurers as well as the one who made the purchase were held free from liability.

LORD SHAND.—This is a question of some delicacy. I have considered the case very carefully, and I think that the legal considerations dwelt upon by Lord Deas are of great importance. I have come to the conclusion that:

proved there was a joint adventure, and that Messrs Lockhart are entitled to payment from Moodie and Company of the price of the yarns. The yarns were sold to Mackenzie on his own individual credit without any reliance by the sellers on the credit of Moodie and Company. If that fact were sufficient to free the defenders from liability there would be an end of the case. But it is clear that, although a merchant may be dealing with another, trusting to the credit of the ostensible buyer alone, he is not limited to that credit if the buyer is not dealing for himself only but for others who are really concerned in the transaction. The question is whether Mackenzie was acting for himself alone, with the view of afterwards selling the yarn as his own property to the joint adventure, or was really acting for the joint concern in making the purchase. Upon the evidence I have come to the conclusion that in making the purchase he acted for the joint adventure. I think all the parties have been honest, and the difference in their evidence has arisen from their different views of the law which should apply to the transaction as appearing on the documents rather than to any real conflict about the facts. The transaction took such a shape as led the defender to think that it was out of the category of joint adventure.

The case is not one in which each of the members of the joint adventure contributed something separately to the joint adventure as his share of it. In such a case the probability is that each adventurer has bought for himself, and on his own credit. If so, having put in his purchase as his contribution, it cannot be properly represented that in making the purchase he acted for the joint adventure. Here both contributed and united to contribute the whole object of the joint adventure. Even in Moodie's view that is so, because he says that they purchased the yarn from Mackenzie and then put it into the joint adventure. The yarn was obviously put in by the parties, Moodie and Company, and Mackenzie, on joint account, and the means of meeting the price was raised by bills to which they were both parties, though Mackenzie, unfortunately for Moodie and Company, failed to pay for the goods.

A good deal of light is thrown on the February transaction by what happened in October. The transaction in February is admitted to have been on the same footing as that in October. The entry in Moodie and Company's books referred to by Lord Deas appears to me to be of great importance, for it records a transaction of joint adventure in express terms. That entry, I see, was brought under the notice of Mr Moodie, and he stated,—“As I read the first entry it records a sale from Mr Mackenzie to joint account,—at least I intended it to bear that meaning.” When it is shewn to Mackenzie he takes a different view of it, for he says,—“The entry does not correctly record the transaction. According to my understanding the yarns were purchased from me for the joint account, and the said entry represents them as purchased by me for the joint account. If Moodie's books, in my judgment, as regards that entry, are incorrect.” There is another document, however, which shews that Mackenzie must have regarded this as a purchase on account of the joint adventure, viz., a memorandum, dated Dundee, 17th October 1874, from Mackenzie to Moodie, in which he says,—“Lockhart has sent on our joint a/c. 3072 sps. 3½-lbs. tow, which I have instructed the railway company to deliver to you.” Thus we have Moodie's books on the one hand recording the transaction as a joint adventure, and the memorandum by Mackenzie on the other stating the transaction in the same way, and both of these pieces of evidence were written at the time when the October purchase was made.

No. 130.

June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

No. 130.

June 8, 1877.

Lockhart v.

Moodie & Co.

As to the February transaction itself, I think the evidence shews that before Mackenzie made the purchase it was arranged between him and Moodie and Company that he should buy the quantity of the particular article, "Lockhart's spin," which he did buy, and that the terms were agreed on at which he was to make the purchase. The documents do not so expressly bear that that was a joint transaction as those relating to the October purchase do. But in place of invoices, as on a resale by Mackenzie, the goods were sent on with invoices of yarn "consigned," and the defenders' acceptances were forwarded to Mackenzie with notes stating these as "advances" on joint account.

The circumstance that Mackenzie agreed to pay an extra farthing per spindle seems to have led the Sheriffs to a different conclusion from that to which I have come, but this circumstance cannot, I think, affect the transaction so as to alter its character as one of joint adventure. The truth appears to be that Mackenzie saw that he could not get the yarn for less, and thought it worth his while to go on and pay the extra farthing, somewhere about £11 in all, out of his own pocket, which he could all the more readily do as he had arranged for a period of credit in payment of the price. The result is that Lockhart is, I think, entitled to decree, but not for a larger sum than Mackenzie was authorised to pay as agent for the joint adventure.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt as to the law, but the question here is attended with difficulty. I have, after serious consideration, come to be of the same opinion as the majority of your Lordships. The question is, whether there were two sales here, or only one. The idea of Mackenzie having put in the yarn as his contribution is out of the question. If Mackenzie, in dealing with Lockhart, was acting for the joint adventure, the pursuer is entitled to prevail. The result of the evidence is, that the arrangement as to joint adventure was made between Moodie and Mackenzie before Mackenzie approached Lockhart and that Mackenzie received instructions to buy yarns at the limited price of 1s. 11d. I think the fair result of the evidence is that Mackenzie was to act as agent for the joint adventure in making the purchase, and I do not think that the circumstance that he agreed to give a farthing more than he was authorised to give deprives him of the character of agent. If an agent exceeds his instructions that does not alter the character of the transaction. He may not bind his principal to a greater amount than he was authorised to bind him, but he will not make himself anything but an agent. The alteration of price, therefore, is immaterial, although the Sheriffs make it the sole ground of their judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated respectively the 30th May and the 7th August 1876: Find that the yarns, the price of which is sued for in this action, were purchased by the defender Robert Mackenzie (against whom decree has been pronounced in absence) from the pursuers (appellants) at the rate specified in the account libelled, viz. 1s. 11½d. per spindle: Find that the said purchase was made by the said Robert Mackenzie for behoof of a joint adventure previously arranged between the defender Robert Mackenzie and the other defenders D. Moodie and Company, that the said yarns formed the sole subject of the joint adventure, and that they were subsequently used by the defenders for the purpose of the joint adventure: Find that the said Robert Mackenzie was authorised by his co-adventurers, D. Moodie and Company, to pay 1s. 11d. per spindle for the said yarns, but was not authorised to pay more, and the said Robert Mackenzie contracted to pay the pursuers at the rate of 1s. 11½d. per spindle without the knowledge or consent of the defenders D. Moodie and Company: But find that the said Robert Mackenzie did not disclose to the pursuers either that he was purchasing for behoof of a joint adventure or that he was restrained by the instructions of his co-adventurers from paying more than 1s. 11d. per spindle for the said yarns: Find that in these circumstances the defenders are in law liable to the pursuers in the price of the said yarns; but find, of consent of the pursuers, that the same is limited to the rate of 1s. 11d. per spindle: Therefore decern against the defenders D. Moodie and Company for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £981, 6s. 8d. sterling, being the price of the yarns in question at the said rate, together with interest on the said sum at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation till payment: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in both the inferior Court and this Court; allow accounts thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report."

No. 130.

June 8, 1877.
Lockhart v.
Moodie & Co.

MACARA & CLARK, W.S.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN SPIER AND OTHERS (Trustees under Mr and Mrs Gibson's Mutual Trust-Disposition and Settlement), AND OTHERS.—Lorimer. No. 131.
JAMES BARCLAY GIBSON AND OTHERS.—M'Laren—Balfour.

June 8, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Gibson, &c.

Husband and Wife—Mutual Settlement—Revocation by Husband.—In 1876 the late Bowman Gibson, proprietor of the farm of Snypes, and his wife, who had married without an antenuptial contract, and who had children, executed a mutual trust-disposition and settlement of their estates, by which, in the event of Mrs Gibson's survivance, she was to receive the residue of the moveable estate as her absolute property, and to have the liferent use of the heritable property. The fee of the heritable estate was destined to J. B. Gibson, or the heirs of his body, and to B. G. Milop, and his heirs, equally. The spouses reserved power to alter or revoke during their joint lives with the knowledge and approbation of the other.

2d DIVISION.
R.

In 1876 Mr Gibson died, survived by his wife, having in 1873 executed a settlement, to which his wife was not a party, by which he revoked all former settlements executed either by himself or mutually with his wife. The provisions to Mrs Gibson in the event of her survivance were not very different from those contained in the mutual settlement, the chief difference being that her liferent of the farm of Snypes was enfeoffed upon by an option given to a legatee to become tenant thereof at a rent somewhat below the true value of the farm. The trustees under the later deed were not identical with the trustees named by the mutual settlement, and the destination of the heritable estate, after the widow's death, was to J. B. Gibson, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to James Gibson.

Mr Gibson's estate chiefly consisted of the small farm of Snypes, entered in the valuation-roll as of the value of £45 a-year, and which he occupied himself. At the date of the mutual settlement his moveable estate was not more than sufficient to pay his debts; but at the date of his death his free moveable estate amounted to about £300. Mrs Gibson's estate was inconsiderable.

In a special case presented by all parties interested in Mr Gibson's

No. 131. succession, the Court held (1) that it was not a sufficient ground for holding the mutual settlement to be revocable by the husband as a donation inter virum et uxorem that the smaller provision in favour of the wife contained in the subsequent unilateral settlement by the husband might have been regarded as a reasonable provision to her; that the provisions in favour of the widow in the mutual settlement were not in the circumstances excessive; that they were consequently not revocable, and must receive full effect; (2) in accordance with Mitchell v. Mitchell's Trustees, supra, p. 800, that there was no onerosity in the mutual settlement except what arose from the widow's claim to a reasonable provision, and therefore that while the revocation could not affect these provisions the later deed of Mr Gibson must otherwise receive effect, and, in particular, that it effectually regulated the ulterior destination of the heritable property, and that the trust-estate fell to be administered by the trustees named in that deed.

D. J. MACBRAIR, S.S.C.—A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 132. SIR FREDERICK J. W. JOHNSTON of Westerhall, Bart., Complainer.—
Lord-Adv. Watson—Mackintosh.
June 8, 1877. JOHN THOMSON, Respondent.—Trayner—Hunter.
Gibson's Trustees v. Gibson, &c.

Landlord and Tenant—Removing—Tacit relocation—Suspension and Interdict.—Held that an application for interdict by a landlord to prevent a tenant in possession of a farm, who alleged tacit relocation, from continuing to cultivate it, and from interfering with the landlord's cultivation, was not a competent process for putting an end to a tenant's possession.

Observed, that suspension and interdict was only appropriate when the tenant was not in possession.

Bill-Chamber. JOHN THOMSON was tenant of the farm of Solwaybank belonging to 1st Division. Sir Frederick Johnston, on a lease for fifteen years. This lease expired
Ld. Curriehill. as to the arable lands at Candlemas, the meadow land on 1st April, and
B. the houses and grass at Whitsunday 1877. The tenant was taken bound to remove at these respective periods, "and that without any warning or process of removing, otherwise the said John Thomson binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to pay £160 sterling per annum and additional rent until removed, . . . without prejudice to the landlord's right to insist in a process of removing." Mr Sherry, factor for Sir Frederick, and Mr Thomson, had a correspondence about a renewal of the lease, which lasted from November 1876 to 20th February 1877. The farm was repeatedly advertised to let, and it was stated that the present tenant would not be an offerer. No arrangement having been made as to the renewal the farm was let to another tenant, and Mr Thomson refused to allow the new tenant to enter upon possession, on the ground that he had received no statutory warning to leave the farm.

In these circumstances Sir Frederick brought the present suspension and interdict, praying the Court "to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said John Thomson from ploughing, sowing, manuring, labouring, or in any way interfering with the said farm of Solwaybank, or any of the fields thereof; and further, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said John Thomson from preventing, or in any way interfering with the complainant or any one authorised by him, entering upon and ploughing, sowing, manuring, labouring, and cultivating the said farm of Solwaybank, or any of the arable fields thereof, and also having such use of the farm-steadings as may be necessary for the stabling and lodging of the animals employed by them in such cultivation."

The respondent pleaded ;—(1) The statement of the complainer is not relevant or sufficient to warrant the prayer of the note, and the same should be refused. (2) The respondent having had no legal notice or warning to remove from the farm in question, the note should be refused. (3) The farm in question having been let to the respondent by tacit relocation for a year beyond the term to which his written lease extended, the note should be refused.

No. 132.
June 9, 1877.
Johnston v. Thomson.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Refuses the note, and decerns : Finds the complainer liable in expenses to the respondent : Appoints an account thereof to be lodged, and remits,” &c.*

The complainer reclaimed.

Argued for the reclamer ;—(1) Notice to remove was not necessary.¹ The correspondence and the advertisements of the farm gave the respondent sufficient notice that he was bound to remove.* (2) Suspension and interdict was the only available remedy to the landlord, because the season for ploughing and sowing would be past before an action of removing could be carried through. Suspension and interdict was a competent process to remove a person in possession whose right to possess had ceased.²

The respondent's counsel was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This tenant was bound to remove at the termination of his lease at three different terms in 1877, viz.—As to the arable land, Candlemas ; as to the meadow ground, 1st April following ; and as to the houses and grass,

* “ NOTE.—Under the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, which comes in place of the regulations of the Act of Sederunt, 1756, formal notice of removal in one or other of the forms prescribed by the statute ought to have been given by the complainer at least forty days before Candlemas, in order to entitle him to remove the respondent from the farm ; but no such notice was given, and the tenant was therefore entitled to regard the farm as relet to him for one year by tacit relocation. In November 1876 and January 1877 some negotiations took place in writing between the complainer and respondent as to a renewal of the lease for a term of years, but no arrangement was effected. In the meantime the farm was advertised repeatedly to be let, with entry to the arable lands as at Candlemas 1877, and it has been let to another tenant conditionally on the respondent being found to have no right to continue in possession. The complainer maintains that by these proceedings on the part of the tenant he has waived his right to retain the farm by tacit relocation, or to object to remove on the ground of want of formal statutory notice. I do not think the contention is well founded, because, although the complainer may have had ground for believing that the respondent considered his tenancy at an end at Candlemas 1877, he was nevertheless bound, if he desired to ensure his tenant's removal, to give him the statutory notice. There must, in my opinion, be either a letter from the landlord delivered or posted to the tenant forty days before the day requiring him to remove, proved by a certificate of a messenger or Sheriff-officer, or an acknowledgment by the tenant, indorsed on the lease. Nothing equivalent to either of these is to be found in this case. The case seems to me to fall under the rule laid down by the Court in the case of the Magistrates of Perth, 20th February 1798, Hume, p. 562.

“ The note of suspension and interdict must therefore be refused, with expenses.”

¹ 2 Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, N. F. 31 ; Heron v. Rollo, June 28, 1825, S. 118 ; Macnair v. Blantyre's Tutors, July 9, 1833, 11 S. 935, 5 Scot. Jur. 83.

² Bain v. Ferguson, Feb. 8, 1840, 2 D. 546, 12 Scot. Jur. 331.

³ Borrows v. Colquhoun, May 25, 1852, 14 D. 791, 24 Scot. Jur. 443, 1 F. & C., 691, August 11, 1854, 26 Scot. Jur. 641 ; Kelso School Board v. Hunter, Dec. 18, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 228.

No. 132.

June 9, 1877.
Johnston v.
Thomson.

at Whitsunday following. It is perhaps not very common that there should be three different issues of a lease, but there is nothing more common than that there should be two, and in giving warning it is quite established that the warning must be given forty days before the first term of removing. In this case there was no warning given, and nothing done of a formal kind to terminate the tenant's possession until after Candlemas. It is maintained by the landlord that certain communications passed between his factor and the tenant which were equivalent to an obligation on the tenant to remove. I assume that that is so, in dealing with a question of competency. Now, what was the landlord's proper remedy? If that obligation was of a definite character it would have founded an action for ejection, but if there was need of some inquiry into the constitution of the obligation then a more formal process would perhaps be necessary; but one or the other was necessary to terminate the tenant's possession. The tenant's possession is not terminated by the expiry of the term of his lease—that is only the commencement of a new term of possession by tacit relocation, just as valid and effectual as his possession under the original lease. Tacit relocation had begun here before any steps were taken by the landlord to terminate the possession of the tenant. The question that is necessarily raised in these circumstances is—Is the tenant in possession by tacit relocation, or is he there in spite of an agreement made by himself forty days before Candlemas to remove at the term? That is a question to be tried in an action of removing. I never saw it tried in any other way, and it is highly undesirable that it should be tried in any other way. Above all, I am clear that the question cannot be tried by a process of suspension and interdict. That is a process only appropriate if the tenant is not in possession. Now, he is de facto in possession, and de jure says he has a right to be in possession. That is a question that can only be tried by a removing or by a process of ejection.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the application for interdict is incompetent, adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the reclaimer liable in additional expenses; allow an account," &c.

WELSH, FORBES, & MACPHERSON, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.— Agents.

No. 133.

June 9, 1877.
Lindsay v.
Walker's
Trustees.

JAMES COCHRANE LINDSAY, Pursuer.—Asher—Strachan.
THOMAS DUNCAN AND OTHERS (Walker's Trustees), Defenders.—Balfour—Mackintosh.
Et c contra.

Process—Review—Joint Minute—Reference to Lord Ordinary.—Terms of joint minute by the parties in a cause which held (diss. Lord Ormisdale) not to exclude review of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

2d DIVISION.
Lord Young.
R.

In counter actions arising out of disputes in connection with the payment of the price of certain heritable subjects, James Cochrane Lindsay the purchaser, and Thomas Duncan and others, trustees of Alexander Walker, the sellers, came to an understanding as to the settlement of the price, and there only remained undecided certain points as to the amount of interest to be paid, and the manner in which the expenses of process were to be borne.

On 14th March 1877 Mr Morison, S.S.C., the agent for Walker's No. 133. Trustees, wrote to Mr Gordon, S.S.C., Lindsay's agent, as follows :—" With reference to what took place before Lord Young, I am now in a position June 9, 1877. ^{Lindsay v. Walker's Trustees.} to settle the whole matter, leaving the Lord Ordinary to decide the question of expenses. . . . I accordingly enclose the draft of a minute which you can be good enough to revise and return to me to-night or to-morrow, so that we may finally get the case taken out of Court on Saturday."

On the same day Mr Gordon wrote to Mr Morison,—“ If we cannot agree as to the question of interest the principal sum may be settled, leaving this question as well as the expenses to be settled by Lord Young.”

A joint minute in the following terms was put into process :—" Strachan the said James Cochrane Lindsay, and Mackintosh for the said Alexander Walker's trustees, stated, that the parties had arranged as to the element of the price of the subjects in question, and the delivery of deeds, and that the only questions remaining were as to the rate of interest payable by the said James Cochrane Lindsay, and the expenses process ; and the parties agreed to these questions being disposed of by Lord Ordinary on the correspondence in process and the following terms, the said James Cochrane Lindsay getting the whole rents from Sunday 1875." . . .

The Lord Ordinary having, on 9th April 1877, disposed of these referred questions in favour of Walker's trustees, Lindsay reclaimed against the interlocutor to the Inner-House.

At the hearing Walker's trustees objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, on the ground that the joint minute had the effect of making the Lord Ordinary an arbiter, it having been the intention of the parties, as appeared from the correspondence, to make his Lordship's judgment final.

It was argued for Lindsay ;—The right of a litigant to obtain review of a Lord Ordinary's judgment was not to be taken away without something more pressing than appeared in the minute.¹ The true effect of the minute was merely a renunciation of probation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is a great pity that when the parties had the question of reference or no reference before them they did not put their intention clearly into words.

It may have come to be of opinion that the terms of this minute did not limit the Lord Ordinary's jurisdiction, so as to make him an arbiter merely. The minute may bear the construction that under it the parties only intended to renounce objection and to leave the process to run its ordinary course as to the question of expenses. As that is so I think the reclaiming note is competent.

It would be inadvisable to exclude review in any case, unless there were very clear expressions by the parties to that effect, and nothing could be easier than to have made the intention unquestionable had that been their desire.

LORD ORMDALE.—I approve entirely of the views expressed by your Lordship in regard to the general principle that the jurisdiction of a Court of Session cannot be held to be excluded except on very clear grounds.

It is there can be no doubt that the parties to an action may, if they please, refer the questions in dispute, or some of them, to a Lord Ordinary, in

¹ Robertson, Petitioner, July 18, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 1104.

No. 133.

June 9, 1877.
Lindsay v.
Walker's
Trustees.

such a way as to exclude review of his judgment. Here the substantial conclusions of the action had been arranged; and nothing remained to be settled except the questions of expenses and interest; and the parties might quite reasonably, I think, have agreed to refer these points to the Lord Ordinary in such a way as to make his determination of them final.

It is true that if we had nothing but the minute from which to discover the intention of the parties as to this it might be a strong thing to say that the reclaiming note is incompetent. It is not, however, usual in minutes renouncing probation to make mention of the Lord Ordinary, and to agree to his disposing of questions before him. Although under the terms of the minute there may be some ambiguity as to the object of the parties I think that the two letters of 14th March, founded on for the respondents, completely clear the matter up. I think in a matter of procedure such as we have here we may look at these letters along with the minute. Now, the respondents' agent in his letter says his object was to take the action finally out of Court, and the agent for the reclaimers, in answer, says nothing to the contrary, but apparently acquiesces in the object as stated by the respondents' agent. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the parties intended that the questions as to interest and expenses should be disposed of by Lord Young without his judgment being liable to review, and in that way finally taking the action out of Court. And if this so the reclaiming note is incompetent.

LORD GIFFORD.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

It is always a difficult matter to take a case depending in the ordinary manner before a Lord Ordinary out of the ordinary course of procedure, and it is always difficult to presume that the parties intended to denude the Judge of his public office as Judge, and to clothe him with the different and separate character of an arbitrator chosen by the private parties. This is not to be presumed without very clear evidence and very clear words. The parties here arranged a part of the merits of the case, and then framed a minute for the purpose of facilitating settlement of the other points.

No doubt it is quite competent for parties to agree that a Lord Ordinary's judgment shall be final, and to renounce what is the right of every litigant, the right of submitting all judgments of the Lord Ordinary to review; but here, and in order to effect this, the renunciation of review must be very clearly expressed. The use of the word "finally," as applied, even in a statute, to a Sheriff's judgment, has been held not to bar an appeal to this Court. Now, I do not think there is enough in this joint minute to exclude review of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I say joint minute, because I am not disposed to construe the minute as signed by counsel, and which alone forms the agreement of the parties, prior correspondence or drafts, or by verbal communings between the agent and counsel. I only look to the minute itself; and I think it would be unsafe to hold that such a minute excluded review, and made the Judge an arbitrator. It is your Lordship's view is the sound one.

THE objection was repelled, and the case heard on the merits.

ALEXANDER GORDON, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ANDREW STEUART, Petitioner and Appellant.—*R. V. Campbell.*JAMES STEPHEN, Respondent.—M'Kechnie.

No. 134.

June 12, 1877.

Interdict—Trespass.—A landlord applied for interdict against a person entering upon a piece of ground belonging to him, but let for agricultural purposes, and averred that the trespass was committed in order to obtain a short cut to an adjoining railway station, and that he feared a right of way might be acquired. The respondent did not assert that there was a right of way, but averred that he had leave from the agricultural tenant, who was not a party to the petition. Application refused.

ON 6th October 1875 Mr Steuart of Auchlunkart presented a petition to the Sheriff Court of Banffshire against James Stephen, shoemaker, Deanshaugh. The petition prayed for interdict against Stephen entering upon a piece of ground, the property of Mr Steuart, but let to and in the occupancy of a Mr Hay as agricultural tenant. It was averred that Stephen and others, residing at Deanshaugh, were in the habit of crossing a piece of ground, which lay between their houses and the Mulben station on the Highland Railway, and that by doing so they got a short cut to the station. The particular act of trespass complained of was on 14th September, when the petitioner averred that Stephen had crossed a piece of land on his way from the station to his house. The petitioner led, that if Stephen and the other residents at Deanshaugh were allowed to go on using the piece of ground as a road to or from the station and other places there was "danger of a right of way through the said piece of land being established, the possibility of which the petitioner has a right to prevent by interdict."

Stephen lodged answers to the petition, in which he admitted that by crossing the piece of land in going from Deanshaugh to the station a distance of about 100 yards would be saved. He explained that on the particular occasion complained of, while returning from the station, he had some cattle, of which he had charge, straying from their grazing ground and among growing corn belonging to Hay, the tenant of the piece of land, and that in order to drive them out of the corn as soon as possible he had crossed the piece of land and committed the act complained of. He added,—“Mr Hay, the tenant of the ground, who had the exclusive right thereto, did not complain of the respondent passing through part of his grass field, and the respondent had general authority from Mr Hay to protect his corn fields from the inroads of cattle.” He also “explained that it was only when it was in grass that the respondent ever walked over the ground in question, and that it was only in grass for two or three years continuously, and is in corn and green crops at other times, according to ordinary rotation.”

He led for the petitioner;—(1) Without the consent of the petitioner, the respondent, who has no right to the piece of land mentioned in the petition, is not entitled to enter upon or walk through the same. (2) The petitioner having given no consent to the respondent to enter upon the piece of land in question, and the respondent having been upon it on 14th September 1875, and walked through the same, without the consent of the petitioner, committed a trespass, and ought to be interdicted from repeating the same. (6) The petitioner, as proprietor of the piece of land in question, is quite entitled to raise and carry on the present action without the consent of the agricultural tenant of said land.

He led for the respondent;—(1) The petitioner not being in the occupancy of the land on which he alleges the respondent trespassed, and not walking on which he craves the respondent to be interdicted, and the land being in the exclusive occupancy of the tenant thereof, who is

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Banffshire.
R.

No. 134. no party to this process, the petitioner has no title nor interest to raise or insist in it. (2) The respondent never having gone upon the piece of land in question save when it was in grass, and that very rarely, and never without the consent nor in opposition to the wishes of the tenant and occupant of the land, the application for interdict is groundless. (3) On the particular occasion condescended on (15th September 1875) the respondent having gone upon the land specified for a necessary and lawful purpose, with a view to save and protect the tenant's crop, was perfectly justified in doing so, and the complaint on that score affords no ground for the present application.

June 12, 1877.
Steuart v.
Stephen.

On 4th December 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Gordon) refused the interdict as craved, and dismissed the petition, with expenses.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—Land in Scotland were only let to tenants for agricultural purposes, and not for other uses, so the acquiescence of the agricultural tenant in the respondent's presence on the ground could not affect the landlord's right to prevent his lands being used as a short cut.¹ Moreover a right of way might be acquired in this manner, which would seriously diminish the value of the land.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this case the allegation of the petitioner, and his ground of action, is trespass, and that necessarily implies a wrong. But all the petitioner says is that the respondent has passed over a field not in his the petitioner's possession at all, but in that of his tenant's, and he does not pretend that the respondent has done him, or any one else, the slightest injury. Nor does the petitioner, as landlord, aver that the tenant who has the right of possession so far as the field said to be trespassed on is concerned, has any objection, or could have had any, to the respondent passing over it, as it is said he did. In no correct sense, therefore, can I hold, on the shewing of the petitioner himself, that the respondent committed any trespass. It would certainly be extraordinary if the tenant of a piece of ground, such as that in question, could not allow his neighbour, like the respondent, to cross his field without subjecting him to a charge of trespass by the landlord.

I think it unnecessary to enter into a consideration of the rights of the landlord and tenant as to permitting or preventing third parties from entering upon ground which has been let to another, or to determine anything on the subject. What I am satisfied of here is that no case of trespass has been disclosed, either in averment or otherwise, of which the petitioner could complain, and therefore that the Sheriff-substitute did right in refusing the interdict asked against the respondent. Anything of the nature of wrong or injury which the petitioner seems to apprehend is that the respondent might, if he were allowed to cross the field in question, establish a right of way on his the petitioner's property. But the respondent does not now say, or, so far as I can see, has ever said that his object was to establish a right of way, or any other right. He says, on the contrary, that he has had the permission of the tenant of the field for all he did. The fear of the petitioner appears to me, therefore, to be quite fanciful, or, at any rate, too remote, indirect, and contingent, to be the ground of an action for trespass.

In these circumstances I am very clear that the appeal should be dismissed.

¹ Breadalbane v. Campbells, Feb. 12, 1851, 13 D. 647, 23 Scot. Jur. 286; Copland v. Maxwell, Feb. 28, 1871, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 1, 43 Scot. Jur. 246, 2 R. 2 Sc. and Div. App. 103; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, 611, secs. 775-7.

MR. GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. It must be borne in mind that No. 134.
 is a possessory action to regulate the state of possession of this field, lying between the respondent's house and the bridge leading to the railway station. June 12, 1877.
 The petition asks that the respondent shall be absolutely and unconditionally Steuart v.
 interdicted from entering upon or crossing the field in question in any circum- Stephen.
 stances. In such an action it is always in the Sheriff's discretion either to grant or withhold interdict, and he is not bound to grant interdict unless he thinks the case is suited for it, and that some serious or material wrong is threatened to be committed.

Now, is there a wrong threatened here? The respondent does not claim as a proprietor a right to go across this field. He only does so when it is in grass, and the tenant does not object. This is no claim to a right of way; if it were the case would be different. But anything of that sort is expressly disavowed. Indeed the refusal of this petition for interdict on the ground that the respondent does not claim any right of way, or any right at all, but only to walk over the tenant's leave, would be a complete answer to an action of right of way—as good a one as if the prayer of the petition had been granted. The substitute is clearly right. He does not dismiss the petition, which would be the case if he held that the petitioner had no title. He refuses the interdict as being too severe a proceeding, and a remedy quite inapplicable to such a case.
 If the respondent were to be interdicted the interdict would require to be qualified in many ways; for example, the respondent's right to cross the field over the leave of the tenant in possession would require to be reserved, and so on. But a qualified interdict of this kind is out of the question.

MR. JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur. The question is, whether we are to interdict a man from taking a short cut which does no harm to any one.
 There seems no real ground for apprehension that a right of way will be constituted. Nothing which the defender has done, or is likely to do, has any tender in that direction. He is not asserting a right of way, but a very reasonable exercise of leave given by the tenant.

MR. GIFFORD by no means prepared to say that if a railway station was erected in a district, and a nearer access could be obtained by a short cut through the land, and the landlord was prepared to allege that constant use was made of the land, he might not interfere by way of interdict. But this is not a case of that description, and I think the Sheriff has come to a right decision.

THE appeal was dismissed.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

ADAM MORTON GLASS, Pursuer.—Balfour—Rankine.
 JOHN HAIG AND COMPANY, Defenders.—McKechnie.

No. 135.

Partnership, dissolution of by bankruptcy—Interest in Sinking of Pit.
 John Haig and Adam Morton Glass having obtained a lease of the coal and fire-clay on the estates of Nellfield, Hairstones, and Braidentered, on 22d April 1872, into a contract of copartnership, which contained, inter alia, the following condition:—"In the event of the bankruptcy of either party the partnership shall be dissolved, and the share shall be the property of the solvent partner; the balance belonging to the bankrupt shall be ascertained, and the solvent partner shall give bills

June 12, 1877.
Glass v. Haig and Company.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Ruthford Clark.
 I.

No. 135. for the amount. . . . Neither the bankrupt nor his creditors shall have any claim to the prospective value of the lease."

June 12, 1877.

Glass v. Haig
and Company.

The working of the minerals was commenced and carried on by firm till 29th May 1873, when the estates of Mr Glass were sequestrated. Between 27th April 1872 and 1st January 1873 Mr Glass contributed upwards of £800 to the firm. A shaft was sunk by the date of Mr Glass's sequestration, and a quantity of limestone had been excavated and sold. Mr Glass was reinvested in his estates in December 1874, and raised an action of count and reckoning against Mr Haig, in which he claimed to be credited with a share of the value of the pit-sinkings. Mr Haig resisted this claim, on the ground that such a claim was barred by the clause in the deed of copartnership above quoted as being a claim for prospective value of the lease. Held that the only value of the pit-sinkings was in connection with the prospective value of the lease, and claim rejected.

MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—WELSH, FORBES, & MACPHERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 136.

WILLIAM SMITH AND ANOTHER (Weir's Trustees), Petitioners.—

Moody Stuart.

June 18, 1877.

Weir's
Trustees.

Trust—Trusts Scotland Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 3 and 4. Authority to Sell Heritage and to make Advances from Capital.—Circumstances in which trustees under a trust-settlement which gave no power to sell were authorised, under section 3 of the Trusts Act, to sell heritable property, and under section 7 of the same Act to advance the price obtained for the maintenance and education of beneficiaries, who were minors.

1ST DIVISION, with three consulted Judges.
Lord Adam.
B.

THE late Samuel Weir died on 16th October 1876. He was survived by one daughter, aged twenty-six, and three sons, the eldest of whom was seventeen years old, and was serving an apprenticeship, and the other two, aged thirteen and eight, were at school.

The whole estate left by Mr Weir consisted of a dwelling-house at South Clerk Street, Edinburgh, valued at £700, and in the valuation stated at the yearly value of £45—(Mr Weir had resided in this house and after his death his children continued to occupy it); two-thirds shares of a shop 14 West Adam Street, Edinburgh, rented at £35 per annum, and valued at £500—(the remaining one-third belonged to the eldest son Duncan, in right of his deceased mother); household furniture valued at £158, 10s. 6d., and money, £108, 17s. 8d. The money was nearly exhausted in paying the debts of Mr Weir, and in the maintenance of the family after his death.

Mr Weir left a trust-disposition and settlement the purposes of which were—"First, for payment of my lawful debts and funeral expenses. Second, I direct my trustees to hold the residue of my estate, heritable and moveable, until my youngest surviving child shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and during that time to give my said daughter, Isabella Ballantyne Weir, the use of my dwelling-house No. 37 South Clerk Street, Edinburgh, and the furniture therein, on the condition that it is to be the home of my children until my youngest surviving child shall attain the age of twenty-one years of age, and also during that period to pay the expenses out of the residue of my estate and effects among my children equally. Third, on my youngest surviving child attaining said age of twenty-one years I direct my trustees to convey to my said daughter, Isabella Ballantyne Weir, my said dwelling-house No. 37 South Clerk Street, Edinburgh. Fourth, in respect that my eldest son, Duncan Weir, is entitled, in right of his mother, to one-third share of the shop No. 14 West Adam Street, Edinburgh, I direct my trustees to convey one of the two-thirds of said shop belonging to me to second son, Samuel Weir, and the remaining one-third to my third son, Alexander Weir. Fifth, after fulfilment of the above purposes of trust I direct my trustees to divide equally among all my children then surviving the whole residue of my said means and estate."

No. 136.
June 18, 1877.
Weir's
Trustees.

The trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement, who were Mr John Weir, writer in Edinburgh, and the eldest daughter of the truster, Miss Isabella Weir, brought a petition under sections 3 and 7 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (which are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President), for authority "to sell the said two-third shares which belonged to the truster of said shop No. 14 West Adam Street, and apply the proceeds of the sale in the maintenance and education of the said Samuel and Alexander Weir; and also, with consent of the said Isabella Ballantyne Weir, to borrow money on the security of the said house No. 37 South Clerk Street to the full amount to which a loan can be obtained thereon, or such other amount as to your Lordships shall seem right, or to sell the same, or to either or both, as they, with consent foresaid, shall deem expedient, to pay the sum so borrowed, or the proceeds of such sale, to the said Isabella Ballantyne Weir, and to make and execute such bond and disposition in security, or bonds and dispositions in security, and deed or deeds of conveyance, as shall be requisite."

The petitioners stated "that except one-third share of the said shop 14 West Adam Street, to which the said Duncan Weir is entitled in right of his mother, the truster's children have no funds or estate other than what is now set forth, and the total income of the trust-estate is quite insufficient for their maintenance, and for the education of the said Samuel and Alexander Weir."

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr John W. Tawse, W.S., to inquire into the circumstances set forth in the petition, and to report.*

Mr Tawse reported—"If the family are to occupy the house in South Clerk Street the income from the estate is only the rent of the shop in West Adam Street, which is insufficient for their maintenance and the education of the younger children."

There is, therefore, a necessity for making the heritable properties in some other way than the mere use of the one and annual return from the other available to supply the wants of the family. It appears to the reporter, however, that regard to the circumstances in which the family are placed, as a fit and proper matter for consideration under this petition, and the ground of necessity to borrow, whether they should not occupy a house at a lower rent, and not the one in Clerk Street. If this were done about £20 a-year would be added to the family income, but which would still be probably insufficient to meet their wants."

The application for power to sell and also to borrow is not consistent with the terms of the trust-deed, and is open to several objections. As the residue of the estate is directed to be held until the youngest child attains twenty-one, the income in the meantime being paid to the children equally, the capital of the trust, consisting mainly of the heritable properties, ought to suffer proportionately.

If, however, the proposal were carried out of selling the shares of the South Clerk Street property destined to the younger children, and applying the proceeds for their maintenance, their share of the capital of the trust-estate would be wholly used up, while the daughter's share of the heritable property, at least the reversion in the event of any money being borrowed on it, would remain to her. Then, again, it is plainly inexpedient, were power given to sell the trustees' interest in the subjects in Adam Street, to give power at the same time to borrow on the other property, at any rate to exercise that power at the same time and consequently have to pay interest on money not immediately required. Therefore, the proposal of the application to the Court is perhaps expedient, where the interests of one individual alone concerned, it does not give due

No. 136. The Lord Ordinary refused the prayer of the petition. *

June 13, 1877.
Weir's
Trustees.

The petitioners reclaimed.

The Court appointed David Roberts, S.S.C., curator ad litem to Duncan Weir, and he lodged a minute in which he stated that he was willing to consent to a sale of the shop in Adam Street.

The Court, after hearing counsel, appointed the cause to be argued before the Judges of the First Division with the assistance of the Judges of the Second Division.

Argued for the petitioners;—The intentions of the truster were: (1) that his debts should be paid; (2) that the whole of his estate should go to his children, and to no one else; (3) that the whole family should reside together in the house in South Clerk Street with their sister, and should be alimented out of his estate. These intentions should, if possible, be carried out, but as it was impossible to carry them out in the way the truster directed, so that the shop be retained by the trustees, the Court should endeavour to carry out as much of the truster's intention as was possible. There was no express prohibition against sale in the trust-deed. Even at common law the Court might have given power to the trustees to sell, and the Trusts Act was intended to give a further power to the Court. A father's representatives were bound to aliment his family, and the trustees could have been compelled to sell the property in order to aliment the family.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This petition is presented under the Trusts Act of 1850 by the trustees of the late Samuel Weir, who were appointed by a trust-deed regard to the legal rights of the respective beneficiaries in the ultimate division of the estate.

“On the whole, the reporter feels the matter remitted to him one of considerable difficulty, as while it was evidently the intention of the truster that his children should occupy the house in Clerk Street, and receive the rents of the shop in Adam Street till the youngest was twenty-one, when the properties were to be conveyed—the house in Clerk Street to the daughter, and one-third of the shop in Adam Street to each of the two younger children—it is impossible, in the present state of matters, the intentions of the truster can be carried out, because at present the children have no means of subsistence.

“In these circumstances, therefore, the reporter thinks it will be sufficient power is given to the trustees to sell the two-thirds of the shop in Adam Street, and should it be necessary to borrow on the Clerk Street house at a future time application may be made to the Court for that purpose.”

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not doubt that it would be expedient that the subjects should be sold, and the proceeds applied in the education and maintenance of the truster's children. He has some doubt whether a sale of the subjects would not be inconsistent with the intention of the truster; but he refused the petition, because he thinks that the rights of Duncan Weir were prejudiced by the proceeds being applied in the maintenance and education of Samuel and Alexander as proposed. Duncan is entitled to a share of the proceeds derived from the subjects, but if the subjects be sold, and the proceeds paid to his two brothers, he would necessarily be deprived of his share of the proceeds. The same objections apply to the borrowing of money on the security of the house in South Clerk Street. The Lord Ordinary was referred to the case of Pattison v. Pattison's Trustees, February 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 575, 42 Scot. Jur. 291; and Hay's Trustees v. Hay Milne, June 13, 1873, 11 Macph. 694, 43 Scot. Jur. 430.”

¹ Erskine v. Wemyss, May 13, 1829, 7 S. 594, 1 Scot. Jur. 163; Henderson v. Somerville, June 22, 1841, 3 D. 1049, 13 Scot. Jur. 489; Anderson, M.C., 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 639.

and settlement executed in 1876. The prayer of the petition is to authorise the petitioners to sell an heritable subject belonging to the truster, and to apply the proceeds for the maintenance and education of his minor children,—that is to say, to apply the capital sum for that purpose. Now, confessedly, the trustees have no such power to sell under the trust-deed, and as little have they power to apply any part of the capital of the estate for the maintenance and education of his children. It is necessary to examine the provisions of the trust-deed to see whether we can grant this authority in consistency with the provisions of the statute.

Mr Weir left four children. At the time of his death his eldest daughter was sixteen, his eldest son was seventeen, and he had other two boys at school, of thirteen, the other of eight years of age. The eldest boy, Duncan Weir, in right of his mother, entitled to one-third of the subject in West Adam Street, the other two-thirds belonging to the truster. Now, the purposes of the trust are—1st, payment of his debts and funeral expenses; 2d, to hold the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, until his youngest surviving child should attain the age of twenty-one years, “and during that time to give the Isabella Ballantyne Weir the use of his dwelling-house No. 37 South Clerk Street, Edinburgh, and the furniture therein, on the condition that it was to be the home of his children until his youngest surviving child should attain twenty-one years of age, and also during that period to pay the income of the residue of his estate and effects among his children equally.” Then he provides that on his youngest surviving child attaining the age of twenty-one years his trustees are to convey to Isabella Ballantyne Weir his dwelling-house 37 South Clerk Street. And the fourth purpose is that his trustees shall convey one of two-thirds of the shop No. 14 West Adam Street, “belonging to him, to his eldest son, Samuel Weir, and the remaining one-third to his third son, Alexander Weir.” And lastly, “after fulfilment of the above purposes of the trust, directed his trustees to divide, equally among all his children then surviving, the whole residue of his said means and estate.”

The condition of the trust-estate is that the dwelling-house in Clerk Street is the most valuable part of the estate. The shop in West Adam Street is let for rent of £35 per annum, but as two-thirds of this alone is available for the maintenance of his younger children, they have little more than £5 a-year each. Household furniture has been valued at £158, 10s. 6d., and the money found in the truster's house and in bank amounts to £108. That last sum has been expended in the maintenance of his children since his death, and in the payment of his debts. The petitioners cannot go on to fulfil the purposes of the trust because they have no funds to maintain the family in the house in Clerk Street with Miss Weir, and therefore they propose to sell the two-thirds of the subject in West Adam Street, and to apply the proceeds so as to enable the family to continue living together in Clerk Street until the youngest child attains twenty-one years of age. The clauses of the Trusts Act founded on are the 3d and 7th, which will certainly be necessary to proceed on both if we are to grant the prayer of the petition. The third clause runs thus—“It shall be competent to the Court of Session, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that it is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof; and the Court shall determine all questions of expenses in relation to such applications, and where it shall be of opinion that the expense

No. 136.

June 13, 1877.

Weir's Trustees.

No. 136. of any such application should not be charged against the trust-estate, it shall so find in disposing of the application :—(1) to sell the trust-estate or any part of it ; (2) to grant feus or long leases of the heritable estate or any part of it ; (3) to borrow money on the security of the trust-estate or any part of it ; (4) to exchange any part of the trust-estate which is heritable." Now, I do not think it is at all doubtful that the proposal made here is "expedient for the execution of the trust," for the petitioners have demonstrated that without it they will not be able to administer the affairs of the trust for behoof of his family so as to support them in family together, which was the main purpose of the trust-deed.

June 13, 1877.
Weir's
Trustees.

The next inquiry is, whether this authority is "not inconsistent with the intention thereof," that is, not inconsistent with the intention of the trust-deed. That is a more difficult question. Now, the Court may certainly authorise some things that may be said to be inconsistent with the intention of the trust-deed—for example, to give a power of sale at all, where it is not given by the trust-deed, may be said to be so, for if the trust-deed had intended that the truster would himself have given it. But that cannot be the meaning of the clause, for its object was to give power to the Court to authorise sales. The true meaning is that the authority sought shall not be inconsistent with the main design or object of the trust, and it seems to me that it will not be so in this case. What is asked is the indispensable thing for obtaining the object of the trust. On this point this case differs from the case of Hay's Trustees, relied on by the Lord Ordinary. The purposes of the trust there were to disencumber the estate of debt, to entail it on a certain series of heirs, and to preserve it entire—to ensure that there was a special prohibition of the sale of any part of it. And, accordingly, we found it impossible to say that the sale of any part was "not inconsistent" with the main purpose of the trust. Here the circumstances of the case are very different indeed. The Lord Ordinary seems to have had an impression that such a proceeding as this would not be consistent with the intention of the truster, but he has based his refusal on the ground that James Weir's interest might be prejudiced by any such proceeding. That difficulty is now removed, because Duncan's curator has made inquiry, and now concludes that the entire subject in West Adam Street shall be sold. On the whole, I am of opinion that the third section applies to this case, and that we are not exceeding the powers given by the statute in granting this authority.

But we must go further, for the trustees ask us to aid them under the third section of the statute. It runs thus—"The Court may from time to time, and on such conditions as they see fit, authorise trustees to advance any part of the capital of a fund destined, either absolutely or contingently, to minor descendants of the truster, being beneficiaries having a vested interest in such fund, if it shall appear that the income of the fund is insufficient or not applicable to, and that such advance is necessary for, the maintenance or education of such beneficiaries, or any of them, and that it is not expressly prohibited by the trust-deed, and that the rights of parties other than the heirs or representatives of the minor beneficiaries shall not be thereby prejudiced." Now, there are a number of conditions there that require to be particularly attended to. We have power to authorise trustees "to advance part of the capital of a fund destined to minor descendants of the truster." What they represent as coming under that description here is the capital produced by the sale of an heritable subject. If an heritable subject is converted into money through the operation of a trust, and with this statute the proceeds will answer the description of the capital of ust-fund. It must be destined "to minor descendants of the truster." Here No. 136.

 e fund will certainly be in that position, for the house itself was in this posion, that one-third part had vested in each of the two younger children. Then, June 13, 1877.
 rther, it is necessary that it should "appear that the income of the fund is in- Weir's ficient or not applicable to, and that such advance is necessary for, the main- Trustees.
 nance or education of such beneficiaries, or any of them." That, as I have d, is well made out, and it is clear that such a proceeding is not "expressly hibited by the trust-deed," and there are no other parties whose rights can sibly be prejudiced. We have therefore a complete compliance with the conditions required by statute.

I feel satisfied that we are applying the statute in such a way as to work out nearly as possible the intentions of the truster. That is satisfactory, for the ect of the Act is that trusts shall be made to work smoothly, so as to carry the wishes of a truster. As to the proposal to borrow money on the security the house in Clerk Street I shall not say more than this at present, that there very different considerations applicable to it.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I substantially agree with the opinion your Lordship just delivered. I am of opinion that the Court has power under the 3d ion of the Trusts Act to direct part of the heritable property of the testator be sold, and that we have also power under the 7th section to direct the em-ment of a proportion of the capital of the trust-estate in alimenting and tating the children of the testator. Nor am I prepared to say that in order support the judgment proposed it is necessary to invoke the provisions of the ute at all.

a regard to the provisions of the 3d section, the elements to be proved are, the step is expedient for the execution of the trust, and that it is not incon-nt with its intention. That it is expedient there can be no doubt, for it is in that otherwise there is no source from which the children can be sup-
 -d. I further think not only that the sale of the heritable subject in quesfor the purpose proposed, is not inconsistent with the intention of the -leed, but that it is essential to its fulfilment. The primary and supereminent t of this settlement, and one superior to all the provisions in regard to the ate division of the estate, was to provide a home for the testator's minor child-and, of course, such support as alone would make the house available. This nite clear from the clause in the deed. The testator plainly assumes that, g with the obligation of the daughter to permit the children to occupy the as their home, there would be sufficient means supplied from his estate to ain and educate them, an object paramount as compared with any ultimate al of the residue. Holding this, therefore, to be the unquestionable inon of the testator in so applying part of the fee of his property, we fulfil rst purpose of the trust in the only way which is practicable.
 e 7th clause also entirely sanctions this course, because, so far as the proceed-on being expressly prohibited by the trust-deed, that its propriety is plainly nised by it. I am not moved by the difficulty suggested, founded on the f the word "fund." I think the phrase equivalent to "property." But if hird section gives power to sell the heritable property the 7th clearly gives r to expend the price for the maintenance and benefit of the children.
 quite concur in the proposed limitation of the sale to the property in ion.

No. 136.

June 18, 1877.
Weir's
Trustees.

LORD DEAS.—It is necessary to keep in mind that we are not here dealing with a case of granting power to a factor for pupils on the ground of necessity. We are dealing with a case under section 3 of the Trusts Act. What your Lordship proposes is that the shop shall be sold under section 3, and that the proceeds shall be applied for the maintenance of the children under section 7. Now section 3 gives us power to grant authority to sell on being satisfied that such sale is “expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof.” That, as I read it, means the intention of the testator as expressed in his trust-deed. We must therefore look to the trust-deed, and not go beyond it. We are not to make a will for the testator, but are to look at his expressed will. I am of opinion with your Lordship that in authorising the trustees to sell the shop we are not doing anything inconsistent with the intention of the testator as expressed in his will, because, as has been well pointed out, that intention was that the whole family were to live together in the dwelling-house as a home for the children, and the intention thus expressed cannot be carried out if they have nothing to live upon. I am, therefore, of opinion that we ought to grant the power of sale under section 3, so far as regards the shop. There is no suspension by the terms of the will of the vesting of the fee of the shop, as there is of the fee of the residue, which, as well as the house, may stand in a very different situation from the shop.

When we come to the application of the money, I find that section 7 provides that we may authorise the trustees “to advance any part of the capital of a fund destined either absolutely or contingently to minor descendants of the trust, being beneficiaries, having a vested interest in the fund.” An objection might have arisen had there not been a vested interest in the fund, but that objection cannot be made here, for the reason I have just stated. In the course proposed by your Lordship I think we are carrying out the purpose of the trust, and we are certainly not going against any purpose which he has expressed.

LORD ORMDALE.—The trustees of the late Mr Weir have presented this petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for authority to sell a shop in West Adam Street, and to borrow money on a house in South Clerk Street, these subjects being parts of the trust-estate; but his Lordship has refused the petition, apparently very much, if not exclusively, upon the ground that the interests of the trustor's eldest son, to whom a third of the West Adam Street shop belonged, would be prejudiced by the proposed sale. That objection, however, may now be held to be obviated by the minute which has been lodged since the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was pronounced for the curator ad litem of the eldest son, stating that he (the eldest son) was “agreeable to the trustees being authorised to sell the two-thirds of the shop, and that he would at the same time sell his own third, so as to give a complete title to a purchaser.” The curator has further stated in the minute that as he conceives the money is absolutely required, and “that there is no other way of raising it, and that it would be for the benefit of all parties interested to have the property sold, he is ready to assent to the Court granting authority.”

The question, in these circumstances, is, whether the Court can authorise the testamentary trustees of the late Mr Samuel Weir to sell the shop in West Adam Street, two-thirds of which form part of the trust-estate, in order that money may be raised for the education and maintenance of the trustor's two younger ons, and it appears to be indisputable that there is no other way by which these No. 136.

essential objects can be accomplished.

But although the truster has left his estate for the ultimate enjoyment of his children, the capital or fee of it cannot, looking merely to the terms of his settlement, be, in the meantime, encroached upon. Neither is any power properly conferred by the settlement on the trustees to sell the trust-estate or to borrow money on its security. It is, however, provided by section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, that it shall be competent for the Court, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to them to sell the trust-estate, or any part of it, or to borrow money on its security, "on being satisfied at the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof."

June 18, 1877.

Weir's
Trustees.

In regard to the expediency of authorising a sale in the circumstances which we here occurred I can have no doubt; and on this point the Lord Ordinary appears also to have been satisfied. Nor is it stated by his Lordship that he considers a sale to be inconsistent with the intention of the trust, although he says he has some doubts on the subject. It is certainly not necessary that there should be anything in the trust-deed that can be held to direct or authorise the trustees to sell the trust-estate or some part of it, for, if the trust-deed had been of that nature, it would have been unnecessary to invoke the statutory powers of the Court. It is enough that the proposed sale is "not inconsistent with the intention of the trust."

Now, it cannot be said that payment or satisfaction of the truster's debts would be inconsistent with the intention of the present or any testamentary trust, for, independently of express provision on the subject, the debts and obligations of Mr Weir must, ante omnia, be paid and satisfied. It is only on his estate that his other directions can have any effect. In the present instance, the first purpose of the trust is payment of the truster's debts. But that goes a very little, if any way at all, to indicate that the truster intended to comprehend within the debts he so directed to be paid such a claim for maintenance and education as that in question, for I do not suppose he had any such claim in his contemplation in appointing as he did, in the first purpose of his trust, his debts to be paid. But, although this may be so, it by no means follows that the proposed sale, when not only expedient, but also indispensable for the maintenance and education of the truster's children, may not very fairly be held to be "not inconsistent with the intention of the trust." That the maintenance and education of his children is not only the duty of a parent, but also an obligation—and it is a reciprocal one—which can be enforced against him, is too clear and well established for argument. So much is this the case that Lord Stair (i., 5, 1) refers to it as a "law written in the hearts of parents and children." And not only is it an obligation enforceable against a parent in his own life, but it also transcends his death against his estate, and his representatives, whether trustees or not, in possession under a gratuitous testamentary title of such estate. On this point it is sufficient to refer to the recent case of Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, cited at the hearing (13th December 1874, 2 Rettie, p. 237), where a young child was held entitled, as a creditor, to aliment out of the trust-estate of its father, although by the terms of the trust-settlement there in question the father had destined the whole of his estate for other purposes, particularly for the benefit of other three children specially named by him. The general law being so, it may, I think, not unreasonably be held that

No. 136. the proposal to sell is not inconsistent with the intention of the trust. The June 13, 1877. truster probably anticipated when his settlement was executed that he would Weir's leave means and estate sufficient not only for the maintenance and education Trustees. of his children till they could maintain themselves, but also to secure to them the other benefits he expressly provided for them, although circumstances have turned out differently from what he had expected. Be this, however, as it may,
 I am unable to hold that it is inconsistent with the trust to authorise the proposed sale. On the contrary, I am not only satisfied that the proposed sale "is expedient for the execution of the trust," but also that it is "not inconsistent with the intention thereof."

Supposing, then, the Court were to authorise the sale of the West Adam Street shop as proposed, and that the proceeds were in the hands of the trustees as a trust-fund, the 7th section of the Act would apply in terminis; for it cannot be doubted that the truster's children are in the position of beneficiaries having a vested interest in that fund; that the income of the fund is insufficient for their present needs; that an advance of the capital or a part of it is necessary for their maintenance or education; and that it is not expressly prohibited by the trust-deed. Nor will the rights of any parties other than the heirs or representatives of the minor beneficiaries, be, so far as I can see, prejudiced by such advance.

The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against ought to be recalled, and the trustees authorised to sell the Adam Street shop as proposed by them, and to make such advance out of the proceeds arising from the sale of the two-third shares of the West Adam Street shop belonging to the truster's two younger children as may be necessary for their education and maintenance.

Whether the Court could authorise the trustees to borrow money on the Clerk Street house, or authorise it to be sold, is a different question, which it is not necessary to determine. I have only to add that I think it very advisable that the Clerk Street house should continue as now to be occupied in common by the family, or, in the words of the truster himself, to be "the home of the children till the youngest shall attain twenty-one years of age."

LORD MURE, LORD GIFFORD, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Grant warrant to and authorise the petitioners with the consent and concurrence of Duncan Weir, the eldest son of the truster, and of David Roberts, S.S.C., his curator ad litem, to sell the shop No. 14 West Adam Street for the best price that can be obtained therefor, and, after paying over to the said Duncan Weir his one-third share of the proceeds of the said sale, to apply the remaining two-thirds to the maintenance and education of Samuel Weir and Alexander Weir, the two younger sons of the truster, and decern ad interim: And authorise the petitioners to charge the expenses of this application, together with the expenses incurred by the said curator ad litem, against the trust-estate, as the said expenses respectively shall be taxed by the Auditor."

DALGLEISH & BELL, W.S., Agents.

EDWARD AVERIL LUCAS AND OTHERS (Sir George de la Poer Beresford's Trustees), Pursuers.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson—Graham Murray. No. 137.
 JAMES GARDNER, Defender.—Kinnear—Asher—Lorimer.

June 13, 1877.
 Beresford's
 Trustees v.
 Gardner.

Reduction—Fraud—Effect of Decree—Lease—Process—Record.—In an action brought by a landlord against a tenant concluding for reduction of a thirty-five years' lease and for removing, the pursuer, after obtaining a verdict which established fraudulent impetration, moved the Court to pronounce decree of reduction and removing. The tenant objected to decree of removing going out, in respect that there existed a memorandum of agreement between the pursuer and him of date prior to the lease under reduction binding the pursuer to recute a lease for twenty-one years.

Held that as the memorandum founded on was not of such a character as to give in itself a title of possession there was no reason why the decree of reduction should not have its ordinary effect, and the pursuer be restored against the lease and reinstated in possession.

Vide supra, p. 194 and p. 363.

The trustees of the late Sir George de la Poer Beresford, proprietors of the estate of Ballachulish, on 1st and 14th November and 2d December 1873 granted a lease of the slate quarries of Ballachulish, for thirty years from Whitsunday 1874, to James Gardner.

In October 1876 Sir George Beresford's trustees raised an action of reduction, removing, and count, reckoning, and payment, against Gardner, on the ground that the lease of November and December 1873 had been obtained from them by fraud.

The case went to trial on the following issue:—"Whether the pursuers, any of them, were induced to execute the lease dated the 1st and 14th November and 2d December 1873, of which No. 12 of process is a copy, by fraudulent representations made by the defender, or by his son George Gardner, writer in Glasgow, on his behalf?"

The jury returned a special verdict finding "that the pursuers, with the exception of Edward Averil Lucas, were induced to execute the lease mentioned in the issue by fraudulent representations made by George Gardner, the defender's son, and that the defender, his father, was a consenting party to his making the said fraudulent representations."

The pursuers thereafter moved the Court to apply the verdict, to rescind the lease, and to grant decree of removing against the defender; and to remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause in reference to the conclusions of count, reckoning, and payment.

The defender resisted this motion, on the ground, as stated in his third plea (which was added on 9th January 1877, after the record had been closed and when the case was in the roll for the adjustment of an issue), that the pursuers were not entitled to decree of removing as concluded "in respect that, in the event of the lease under reduction being set aside, the defender will be entitled to obtain a lease from the pursuers in pursuance of the agreement of 7th June 1873, or otherwise in terms of the agreement set forth in the condescendence." (The agreement last referred to was a verbal agreement to grant a lease for fifteen years.)

The only reference on record to the agreement of 7th June was contained in the 5th and 6th articles of the defender's statement of facts, in which it was stated incidentally and as part of the narrative with reference to the lease under reduction,—(Stat. 5). . . . "It was farther agreed between the parties that the defender should take a lease of the quarries and the adjoining dwelling-house, called Larroch House. . . . The first agreement with regard to the lease was made in June 1873, and was to the

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Rutherford
 Clark.
 B.

No. 137.
June 13, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

effect that a lease for twenty-one years should be granted immediately on the expiry of the existing lease to Mr Pitcairn, on the same terms and conditions as to rent and lordship." (Then followed further details of the agreement). "The said agreement having been made, a memorandum thereof was drawn up and signed by the parties at Rothesay on the 7th of June 1873."

The memorandum of 7th June 1873 itself bore to be a minute of agreement between the pursuers, the first parties, and the defender, the second party, and was in these terms:—"The first parties agree and engage immediately on the expiry of the present lease in favour of Alexander Pitcairn of the slate quarries, &c., at Ballachulish, Argyleshire, to grant to the second party a lease thereof, in the same terms and conditions as to rent, lordship, and otherwise as are expressed in the lease in favour of Mr Pitcairn, and that for the period of twenty-one years from Whitsunday 1874, being the date of expiry of Mr Pitcairn's lease." (Then followed certain particular stipulations). "A formal lease to be prepared by Archibald Ferguson, writer, Glasgow, or at all events revised by him, on behalf of the second party, embodying the foresaid terms, and to be complete prior to Whitsunday 1874. In witness whereof, these presents, written on this and the six preceding pages, by the said Archibald Ferguson, as subscribed by the parties at Rothesay the 7th day of June 1873, before these witnesses, the said Archibald Ferguson, and George Gardner, writer Glasgow.—ELIZABETH BERESFORD; EDW. A. LUCAS; CHAS. D. LUCAS JAMES GARDNER. Archd. Ferguson, witness; George Gardner, witness Rothesay, 7th June 1873."

This document consisted of six pages, the first five of which were initialed merely by the parties, and only the last signed. It was stated that the testing-clause was only filled up after the deed had been produced in process, when the defender added to the record his third plea in law. It was disputed whether the witnesses though present at the signing of the memorandum had been called on to act as instrumentary witnesses, whether they had not signed ex intervallo at the request of the defender alone.

Argued for the defender;—The memorandum of 7th June 1873 was valid and binding deed, notwithstanding (1) that it was signed on the first five pages by initials only,¹ and (2) that the testing-clause had been filled up after the deed had been produced in process, it not having been produced in judgment.² The result was that the pursuers were bound to execute a lease in terms of the memorandum. That being so, there were no good reasons for putting the defender out of possession, when he was entitled to be immediately reinstated in possession. The verdict therefore should be applied only to reduce the existing lease, and a remit should be made to a man of business to prepare a new lease in terms of the memorandum.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The memorandum of 7th June did not bear on its face to be a lease, but only a contract for the execution of a lease. Were things intact the pursuers' only action on the memorandum would have been one not to obtain possession, but to obtain a lease or title of possession. Had any possession followed on the memorandum it would have been different. But the possession which the defender had had was on another title altogether. The lease on which the defender had been possessing having come to an end by reduction, parties should be re-mitted to their original position, the defender's right being in obligatione tantum. If possession had been inverted then matters should be restored. (2) There were no averments on record to sustain the defender's third plea in law. Setting aside all questions as to formality of execution the averment on record shewed that the document never was in the defender's own view obligatory or intended to be completed as a probative writ. The averments on record were quite irrelevant to sustain an action founded on it. But (3) the deed was improbable,¹ or, at least, could only be set up by direct action. This was not the process in which to try the questions raised as to its execution. The defender would not have been entitled to obtain possession on a document with regard to the execution of which there were such serious questions without setting it up by a direct action. Still less was he now entitled to retain possession.

¹ 1696, c. 15.

² Conveyancing Act, 1874, 37 and 38 Vict., cap. 94, sec. 39; Ogilvie v. Finlater, 1674, M. 16,804; Paton's Creditors, 1711, M. 16,807; M'Donald v. M'Donald, 1714, M. 16,808; Drury v. Drury, 1753, M. 16,936; Hill Arthur, Dec. 6, 1870, 9 Macph. 223, 43 Scot. Jur. 171; Addison, Feb. 23, 1877, ante, vol. ii., 457; M'Laren v. Menzies, July 20, 1876, ante, vol. iii., 11; Stewart v. Burns, Feb. 1, 1877, supra, p. 427.

No. 137.

June 18, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The motion of the pursuers is that the verdict of the jury be applied, and that decree of reduction and removing be pronounced in terms of the summons.

The objection offered on the part of the defender is founded on his third plea, which was added to the record by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 9th January last. Now, in order to judge of the validity of that plea it is necessary to have in view what is the nature of the action and what its conclusions. The first conclusion is for reduction of the lease to the defender, dated 10th and 14th November and 2d December 1873, of the slate quarries of Ballachulish. The second conclusion is for removing of the defender. And the third conclusion is for his accounting, not only as tenant but also as creditor in possession of the estate under an ex facie absolute disposition with an explanatory agreement.

Now, the pursuers aver in article 13 of the condescendence that the defender entered into possession of the quarries under the lease sought to be reduced at Whitsunday 1874. In the answer the defender admits "that the pursuers executed a lease of said quarries in favour of the defender, and that he entered to possession at Whitsunday 1874." It is now established that that lease was obtained by fraud, and falls to be set aside, and that lease is on the defender's own shewing the only title under which the defender holds or ever has held possession. It seems to me to follow, as a necessary consequence, that when that title of possession is set aside on the ground of fraud, the fraudulent possession which has followed on it must also come to an end. If I at all understand the nature of an action of reduction, a decree in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons operates as an entire restitution of the pursuer against the fraud which has been practised upon him, and consequently, as the summons itself expresses it, he is to be reposed and restored thereagainst in integrum—not only ¹ Ross' Lect., 1, 136; Ersk., 3, 2, 8; Home v. Dickson, 1730, M. 16,898, rep. in M. Bell's Lect., ed. 1876, 1, 52; Thomson v. M'Crummen's Trustees, Feb. 1, 1856, 18 D. 470; M. Bell's Lectures, ed. 1876, 1, 48; Dickson on Evidence, sec. 727.

No. 137. against the particular deed sought to be reduced, but also against all that has followed or may follow thereon. The notion of allowing a person to retain possession of a heritable subject for a single day after his title has been set aside on the ground of fraud is entirely inconsistent with the theory of an action of reduction on that ground.

June 13, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

What, then, is the plea to the contrary maintained here by the defender: "The pursuers are not entitled to decree of removing as concluded for, in respect that in the event of the lease under reduction being set aside, the defender will be entitled to obtain a lease from the pursuers in terms of the agreement of 7th June 1873, or otherwise, in terms of the agreement set forth in the condescendence"—that last being a verbal agreement. The only thing that can be seriously maintained under this plea—if, indeed, even that be seriously maintained—is that the defender is entitled to remain in possession notwithstanding that his fraudulent title has been set aside, because he has another title under which he may obtain a lease to be executed. Now, even supposing the writing of 7th June 1873 to be a probative document I think that this is a bad plea, because all that that writing binds the parties to do is to adjust a lease by which the defender may obtain possession of the quarries. But on the true construction of that document he is not, in my opinion, entitled to enter into possession except of consent until such lease is adjusted. As the document is expressed I think the defender was bound to have the terms of the lease adjusted so as to enable him to enter into possession at the term of Whitsunday 1874. At any rate if the terms were not then adjusted he was not in law entitled to enter into possession at that term.

But, over and above that, the document is, to say the least of it, not clearly probative document. And how is it set forth on record? It is mentioned by the defender, narrative, as a mere memorandum of terms of lease verbally agreed to. So far as the pursuers are concerned they had no call to say a word on record about the document, and they have had no opportunity of adding any statement since the change of ground taken by the defender, and his founding plea in defence of it. Before we could consider the rights of parties under the document we should be bound to have a record made up, and to allow a proof for certainly without a proof the document can never be set up as a probative document.

In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defender's third plea in law is irrelevant, and I am therefore for granting the motion of the pursuers.

If the defender thinks that he can set up this document of 7th June 1873 as a fresh title of possession there is of course nothing to prevent him doing so by an appropriate action.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship that the lease which the defender had obtained having been set aside on the ground of fraud, the defender cannot be allowed to retain possession in the meantime, whatever right he may eventually establish in virtue of the document of June 1873 in any subsequent proceeding. To say the least of it, there are important questions requiring to be decided in the defender's favour before that document of June 1873 can be set up either as a lease or as entitling him to obtain a lease. We are no doubt familiar with the practice of holding that an agreement which specifies the subject, the rent, and the period of endurance, may itself form a good title of possession, but that the adjustment and execution of a formal lease, according to recognised rules applicable to the particular subject, may be insisted on at any time. That has generally occurred in reference to agricultural leases, when, in former days, transactions with tenants were regarded as inter rusticos, and much that was usual was held to be understood between the parties. But this document of June 1873 is peculiar in its terms. There is much in it to favour the construction that there is to be no lease at all unless a formal lease should be prepared and completed prior to Whitsunday 1874. That is one difficulty the defender has to overcome.

Then there will be a question whether the document is duly tested. It consists indeed a testing-clause crushed in where, it is obvious, no testing-clause ever intended to be. But it is averred, and would rather appear to be the case, that that testing-clause was not there until after the document had been produced in process; and, indeed, it is averred that it was not there till after the making of the record. It may be an important question whether, if these averments or either of them shall turn out to be true, the document can be held to stand at all.

Thirdly, there will be an important question whether that document can be held to be subscribed in terms of the statute. It consists of two sheets, and four or more pages of it are signed (if signed at all) only by initials.

I cannot, I think, be called upon to determine these questions at present. I will content myself to shew that there are important questions to be tried before a verdict can be given to the document now founded on.

The defender no doubt says that even supposing this document not to be valid, he is entitled to have it made so under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. This, again, raises an important question, for in order to make this out the defender must establish that the Act is retrospective, whereas the Act itself contains expressions which are plausibly said to infer the contrary except in cases in which it specially provides for. It will be a startling result if a man shall be enabled by the statute to set up any improbativ document he may happen to find in his charter-chest, whatever may be its date. But all I say at present is that whatever may be the result of any future proceedings which the defender may be advised to institute, I cannot hold that, in the face of this adverse verdict on the ground of fraud, he is entitled to retain possession until these important questions shall be appropriately raised and decided.

MR MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Apply the verdict; and, in respect thereof, reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Further, repel the third plea in law stated by the defender, and decern in terms of the conclusions for removing: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses since 15th December 1876, the date of closing the record," &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ADAMSON, & GULLAND, W.S.—Agents.

No. 137.
June 13, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

No. 138.

June 14, 1877.
M'Carter v.
Stewart and Mackenzie.

JOHN M'CARTER, Appellant (Pursuer).—Balfour—M'Kechzie.
STEWART AND MACKENZIE, Respondents (Defenders).—Trayner—R. V. Campbell.

Sale—Delivery—Defective quality—Rejection—Exception to general rule.

A general understanding existed between a merchant and a manufacturer that the former was to supply the latter with certain goods as required, to be used in his business.

On 1st February 1876 the merchant was ordered to stop further deliveries, but the order was misunderstood, and notwithstanding thereof he continued to deliver as before, and the deliveries were accepted without the manufacturer's personal knowledge. A series of eight separate deliveries had been made in the month of February before the manufacturer became, on 29th February, aware of what was taking place. On examination it was found that such of the goods as had not been used up in the works were defective in quality, and on 3d March they were rejected.

Held that the course of dealing between the parties was not one to which the strict rule of law as to the immediate rejection of defective goods could be applied, and that examination of the goods was made and their rejection intimated to the merchant in reasonable time.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrewshire.
M.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, at the instance of John M'Carter, marine store dealer, Glasgow, against Stewart and Mackenzie, papermakers, Pollockshaws, to recover the price of certain goods sold and delivered by the pursuer to the defenders in the months of December 1875 and February 1876.

The defenders admitted liability for the price of the goods sued for, with the exception of certain parcels of round ropes delivered on eight different dates between 1st and 29th February 1876, and consigned to the Court the balance admittedly due.

With regard to the round rope delivered in February it was proved that in the beginning of February the defender, who had had a standing order for some time for delivery to the pursuers of round ropes as required for their business, was informed that the pursuers would take no more goods from him, and that he was to cease his deliveries; that notwithstanding the intimation, which was apparently misunderstood by him, the pursuer continued during the month of February to send parcels of round rope as before, and that these to the amount of twenty-six bales weighing seventy-eight cwt., were received at the defenders' works with the personal knowledge of the defenders; that on 29th February it came to the knowledge of the defenders that these deliveries were being made, and that they at once stopped farther deliveries; that on examination it was discovered that of the round rope delivered in February eleven bales weighing thirty-three cwt., had been used up in the defenders' works without their knowledge, and that the remaining fifteen bales, weighing five cwt., were not composed of round rope but of a counterfeit substitute for it; that the defenders on making this discovery on 3d March rejected what remained of the bales.

For what was thus rejected the defenders refused to pay, on the ground that it was delivered against their express orders, and that even if by accepting delivery they were to be held as having purchased it, it was not the material which it was represented to be, and had been timeously rejected.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) sustained this defence.

The Sheriff (Fraser) adhered on appeal.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.¹

Authorities referred to.—M'Cormick v. Rittmeyer, June 3, 1869, 7 Mac

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff are right in the view of the evidence which they have taken. The fifteen bales of goods in question were delivered in February to the defenders, and were on examination, in March following, found to be composed of inferior materials, and were ordered back to the pursuer immediately on the defenders becoming aware of their having been delivered and being so defective in quality. The only other question raised on record was whether the fifteen bales were in point of fact delivered by the pursuer or by somebody else. On that point also I agree with the Sheriffs.

No. 138.
June 14, 1877.
M'Carter v.
Stewart and Mackenzie.

The only point of real importance in the case is whether, in pronouncing decree in accordance with this view of the facts, the Sheriffs were not infringing the rule of law applicable to the position of parties who receive goods delivered to them as purchasers, and afterwards object to the quality.

There is no doubt as to the general rule of law that it is the duty of such purchaser, on receiving delivery, immediately to give notice of the inferiority of the delivery, to reject the goods, and to rescind the contract.

But the circumstances of the case are peculiar. It is not the ordinary case of action for goods sold and delivered under a single contract of sale, nor even under successive contracts. It is an action founded on a series of dealings, in which one party supplies goods as required to be used in the conduct of the business of the other party. There was here no express order but merely an understanding that the pursuer was to furnish certain goods, and the defenders use them up in their manufactory as required. On that understanding a series of deliveries were made by the pursuer in December and January. Then when bales are proved to have been delivered at various times in February. It is not possible to say now at what particular times these fifteen bales were delivered, but that they were delivered in pursuance of the general agreement so mentioned is, as I have said, proved.

Now, it would be neither expedient nor just to apply to a case of this kind the general rule of law applicable to cases where delivery has been made under a definite contract. There is here no proper contract to rescind. The goods are delivered just as it pleases the seller to deliver them, and are used just as the purchaser requires them. It would be very hard to require the purchaser to examine every bale as delivered, and accept it or reject it at once. In such a case the general rule I have mentioned may, I think, be relaxed. If, within a reasonable time, the purchaser, when he comes to use the goods, finds they are defective, and then at once objects, I think he is entitled then to return them. The rest of the deliveries may have been used up or may be fit for use in the defenders' business. But that is not to prevent the defenders having an opportunity of returning any particular deliveries which are manifestly unfit for use. In such a case as this, therefore, I am of opinion that there is an exception from the general rule laid down in the cases of M'Cormick, and Couston, Thomson, and Company.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Find in fact that the goods

41 Scot. Jur. 465 ; Chapman v. Couston, Thomson, and Company, March 1871, 9 Macph. 675, 43 Scot. Jur. 326, July 19, 1872, 10 Macph. (H. of L.) 44 Scot. Jur. 402

No. 138.

June 14, 1877.
M'Carter v.
Stewart and
Mackenzie.

marked 'round rope' in the account sued for as supplied in February 1876 were delivered at the defenders' (respondents') works against their express orders, were received there without the knowledge of the principals, were on examination in the beginning of March found to be composed of inferior materials and not proper round ropes, and were to the extent of fifteen bales tendered by the pursuer (appellant) early in March immediately on the defenders becoming aware of their having been delivered and being so defective in quality; that the said bales weigh about forty-five cwt. and are lying at the defenders' works for delivery to the pursuer, who has refused to take delivery thereof: . . . Find in law that the defenders are not liable in the circumstances above mentioned to pay for the fifteen bales of round rope: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern," &c.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—JOHN MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 139.

June 14, 1877.
Fraser v.
School Board
of Carluke.

JOHN FRASER, Pursuer.—Wallace.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF CARLUKE, Defenders.—Traynor
—Moncreiff.

School—Education Act, 1872, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 55—Emoluments of Schoolmaster.—The Education Act, 1872, provides (sec. 55) that teachers "appointed prior to its coming into operation shall not, with respect to emoluments as by law, contract, or usage, secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of the Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions" therein contained. Held that a master who, at the passing of the Act, was in receipt of a fixed salary and school fees, was entitled (1) to continued payment of his full salary, though he had for some time prior to the passing of the Act voluntarily employed and paid an assistant, whose place was afterwards filled by a regular assistant employed and paid by the school board; and (2) to the actual school fees paid in each year so long as the school remained on its former footing, and not merely to the average as at the passing of the Act.

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Rutherford
 Clark.
 B.

IN this action a question was raised under the 55th section of the Education Act, 1872,* as to what were the "emoluments" "as by law, contract, or usage, secured to or enjoyed by him" of a parochial schoolmaster appointed prior to that Act.

The pursuer of the action, John Fraser, had been appointed master of the parish school of Carluke in 1852. After the passing of the Parish and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861, the heritors of the parish by a meeting fixed "the salary of the schoolmaster of this parish at a maximum rate of £70 per annum, Mr Fraser agreeing to allow to a female assistant a salary of not less than £30 sterling per annum out of the gross income." Mr Fraser also enjoyed from the date of his appointment the whole school fees.

At the date of the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the average attendance at the parish school was about 205, and the average fees were about £220 a-year. A female teacher was employed, to whose salary

*Section 55 of the Education Act, 1872, provides that, "subject to the provisions hereinafter contained regarding the removal of the teachers of public schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act, such teachers shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage, secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively."

rsuer contributed £30 in terms of his agreement with the heritors. The rsuer also of his own accord employed a male assistant to whom he paid salary of £40. He averred, however, that the employment of a male assistant was not necessary for the efficient conduct of the school at that time, but was a voluntary act on his part.

After the passing of the Education Act of 1872 the school board determined to fix the pursuer's salary at the average of the fees drawn by him the date of the passing of the Act, whatever that might be ascertained to be, and to take upon themselves the burden of supplying him with a male and female assistant.

To this the pursuer refused to agree, and claimed the whole school fees, together with a salary of £70 a-year, subject to deduction of £30 for a male teacher. He raised the present action to enforce his demand.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—Finds that at the date of the passing of the Education Act the pursuer had a salary of £70 a-year and the fees of the school, subject to the obligation of payment of £30 a-year as the salary of a female assistant: Finds that down to the present time the pursuer is entitled to receive the said salary and the fees of the school: And with these findings appoints the pursuer to be put to the roll for further procedure: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses as far as hitherto incurred," &c.*

"NOTE.—When the Education Act passed, the pursuer had a salary of £70 per annum and the fees paid by the pupils, but subject to the obligation of paying a salary of £30 per annum to a female assistant. The school was then very populous and largely attended. Of his own accord the pursuer employed a female assistant at a salary of £40; but he explains that this was due to the fact that he required help, because he was registrar of the parish, and because he was engaged in certain duties in connection with the Education Bill then before Parliament.

Since the Education Act was passed various attempts have been made on the part of the defenders to fix the remuneration which the pursuer should receive. But they have proceeded on the footing that his salary was absorbed by the payment of assistants, and that his emoluments consisted entirely in the fees of the school. The Lord Ordinary regrets that the defenders have seen fit to take this view. The employment of a male assistant was a voluntary act on the part of the pursuer, and the Lord Ordinary has no reason to think that it was in any respect a necessary condition of his ability to earn the fees. The course which has been led is directly to the contrary.

[This point settled, there is not much difference between the parties. The pursuer claims the fees of the school as it at present exists, and the defenders are of opinion that he should receive them, though they do not acknowledge his right. A material change is about to be made in the constitution of the school; and it is contended that change is made the pursuer does not contend that he can thereafter receive the fees. He contends for no more than that he shall not be prejudiced in respect of the emoluments which he enjoyed at the passing of the Act.

The Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuer is entitled to the fees which have hitherto been received at the school, and, for anything which he yet sees, that the pursuer will be entitled to the fees till the school is placed on its new footing.

There has no doubt been an increase in the teaching staff, to meet modern requirements; but it does not appear that the attendance of pupils has materially increased since the Act was passed, or that such increase as there may be would have taken place if things had remained as before. The defenders contend that the emoluments to which the pursuer is entitled as of right must be ascertained by reference to the amount which he was earning when the Act passed, and by reference to an average of previous years. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the prospects of the school cannot be thrown out of account. The pursuer held an office which entitled him to such fees as were received from

No. 139.

June 14, 1877.
Fraser v.
School Board
of Carlisle.

No. 139. LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded.

June 14, 1877.

Fraser v.

School Board
of Carluke.

The question to be determined is, what were the pursuer's emoluments as master of Carluke Parish School, by law, contract, or usage, prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872. It appears to me that the emoluments of this gentleman were secured to him partly by law, so far as the school fees were concerned, and partly by contract, as regarded his salary. The contract between the heritors and the schoolmaster is embodied in a minute of the heritors, by which the fixed "the salary of the schoolmaster of this parish at the maximum rate of £7 sterling per annum, Mr Fraser agreeing to allow to his female assistant a salary of not less than £30 sterling per annum out of his gross income." It appears to me therefore, that, according to the 55th section of the Education Act, 1872, the emoluments of this gentleman consisted of the school fees to which he was entitled by law, and also of a salary of £70, subject to deduction of £30. I should have hesitated as to allowing proof in these circumstances. I think it is irrelevant to say that these being his emoluments, he chose voluntarily to take assistance, and pay for it out of his own pocket. That does not affect the question of his emoluments as secured to him by law and contract. But if we are to look at the evidence I do not think that the facts proved establish that assistance was necessary. I adopt the view of the facts taken by the Lord Ordinary in the note, and I farther think that the qualification contained in the latter part of the note is a proper qualification.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—MACONOCHE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 140. GLASGOW ROYAL INFIRMARY, Respondents (Pursuers).—R. V. Campbell

June 15, 1877.

Glasgow Royal

Infirmary v.

Wylie, &c.

REV. ALEXANDER WYLIE AND OTHERS (Trustees of Bath Street Baptist Church, Glasgow), Appellants (Defenders).—Balfour—Alison.

Property—Mutual Gable.—To an action by the proprietor of a tenement burgh against the proprietor of the adjoining stance to recover one-half the value of a mutual gable, of which the defender had taken the use, it was pleaded in defence (1) that the mutual gable having been erected by the common authority of the parties no claim arose to the proprietor of one stance against the proprietor of the other; (2) that such use had been made by the common proprietor of the gable by subsequent proprietors of the defenders' stance, of the mutual gable that pupils. He is a very successful teacher, and he might very naturally have been allowed to increase his emoluments by increasing the number of scholars. The value of his office cannot be fairly estimated without taking its prospects into account.

"The defenders have not tendered any salary which, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, was a fair compensation for the emoluments which the pursuer previously enjoyed. For they have offered to transact only on the footing that the pursuer is not entitled to any salary. The Lord Ordinary therefore holds that the pursuer is entitled to claim his former salary and the fees of the school down to the present time. But, as at present advised, he does not think that he can pronounce any decree applicable to the future. For he cannot interfere with the arrangements which the defenders may lawfully make, and he cannot pronounce any decree which will fix the rights of the pursuer in the future. These are subject to changes which may be made from time to time in the school."

defenders on purchasing the stance were entitled to assume that the claim for half the cost of the mutual gable had been extinguished or settled. Held that the common author in conveying the one stance to the pursuers or authors, with the tenement erected thereon, conveyed likewise a right as just himself or his singular successors in the adjoining stance to recover one half the cost of the mutual gable whenever they came to make use of it; and that the use of the gable by the defenders' author was by buildings of such temporary nature that the defenders were bound to have satisfied themselves in inquiry as to the state of the facts before they purchased.

No. 140.

June 15, 1877.
Glasgow Royal
Infirmary v.
Wylie, &c.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, as proprietors of the tenement No. 38 Cambridge Street, Glasgow, against the Rev. Alexander Wylie and others, the trustees of Bath Street Baptist Chapel, as proprietors of the adjoining stance to the south of the pursuers' tenement, to recover one-half of cost of the mutual gable, which was built in 1852, and which came to be used by defenders in 1874 when they began to build on their property.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

The defence was (1) that the mutual gable in question had been erected in 1852 by George Sharp, then the common proprietor of both stances; that he erected on the one side of it the tenement belonging to the pursuers, and on the ground afterwards conveyed to the defenders, a building which the mutual gable formed one side and the flues from which were into the vent of the mutual gable; that this building was pulled down by the defenders before they erected their present tenement, consisting of a house below and a chapel above; that in these circumstances no claim was made for half the cost of the mutual gable to the pursuers when they purchased their property, all such claim having been extinguished by rescissio when the two properties were in the hands of the common proprietor Sharp. (2) That Sharp sold off the defenders' stance to Messrs Glasgow and Scott, who sold to Peter Walker, who sold to the defenders; Messrs Douglas and Scott made farther use of the mutual gable; the mutual gable having been thus used by the defenders' predecessors or authors, there was a presumption of payment by the party who used it to the then proprietor of the adjoining ground; and in any event no liability could transmit against the defenders, who did not reject any of their predecessors in the property, having acquired it by purchase.

The Sheriff-substitute (A. Erskine Murray) repelled the defences, and decreed against the defenders for one-half the cost of the mutual gable.

The Sheriff (F. W. Clark) adhered on appeal.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

The facts of the case are stated by the First Division in their interdict of 15th June 1877 disposing of the appeal. They "find (1) that that George Sharp was proprietor about 1852 on separate titles both of the ground on the east side of Cambridge Street, now the property of the pursuers (respondents) the Royal Infirmary, and the adjoining stance to the south, now the property of the defenders (appellants) and others: Find (2) that there was at that time an office, a small temporary building on the stance now defenders', against the boundary a two-stall stable behind it: Find (3) that in 1852 Sharp erected a tenement of three stories besides the sunk story on the stance, now pursued, with a mutual gable along the boundary of the two stances: Find (4) that on the erection of this gable the old north wall of the office and house was taken down and replaced by the gable, and its flue let into the vents of the gable coming from the sunk flat, and the joists, &c. of the office and stable were let into the gable wall: Find (5) that on 31st March 1853 Sharp sold to a party, Craig, the tenement under the dis-

No. 140. position recited in 5-6 of process without any special reference to the mutual gable or reservation in respect thereof: Find (6) that about 1851 Sharp added to the one-story erections on the southern stance a one stall stable behind or further east than the two-stall stable, and a shed still further east, all against the gable wall: Find (7) that in 1862 Sharp sold the southern stance to Douglas, who, in 1871, sold to his partner Scott, and it was occupied from 1862 to 1874 as a mason's shed: Find (8) that Douglas and Scott changed the office into a room and the two stall stable into a kitchen, occupied as a house by Scott, the fireplaces of room and kitchen being in adjoining corners and leading into the same flue of the gable: Find (9) that Scott being troubled by smoke blowing down put a can on the top of the chimney of the gable with which the flues connected: Find (10) that in 1874 the southern stance was acquired by Peter Walker, who immediately transferred it to the defenders, who are the trustees of a Baptist congregation, and have erected thereon shops below and a chapel above to the height of the gable, using two of the vents, one in a shop and one in the vestry, and walling up the other vents and presses."

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The common proprietor of both tenements having himself used the mutual gable before parting with the stance afterwards conveyed to the defenders, he himself would have had no claim against his own disponees for one-half the cost. The right to continue to use it was included in the conveyance by him. The pursuers as his singular successors could have no claim which he had not.¹ The use proved was sufficient.²

Argued for the respondents;—The use of the mutual gable proved was merely of a temporary nature, and insufficient to raise a claim against the defenders or their authors for half the cost of the mutual gable. It could not therefore bar that claim when they came to make a permanent use of it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers are proprietors of the tenement of ground No. 38 Cambridge Street, Glasgow, and the defenders are proprietors of the adjoining tenement of ground in the same street, lying to the south of No. 38. These two tenements of ground at one time, and before either was built upon, belonged to one person, Mr Sharp. He acquired them, indeed, by separate titles though apparently from the same author. In 1851 he got a conveyance to the subjects which are now the property of the defenders, the Bath Street Baptist Chapel Congregation, and in November 1852 he acquired the subjects which now belong to the Glasgow Royal Infirmary.

While proprietor of both stances, Mr Sharp built on the last mentioned, which now belongs to the infirmary; and in doing so he erected a gable wall in the usual way along the boundary between the two stances. After he had built on the one stance Mr Sharp conveyed it and the buildings upon it to the predecessors of the infirmary. He subsequently sold the other stance, when unbuilt upon, to the predecessors of the Baptist Chapel Congregation. The Baptist Chapel Congregation are now proceeding to erect a building upon the ground, making use to a certain extent of the gable of the pursuers' tenement as a mutual gable. The pursuers now demand from the defenders one-half the cost of the gable wall. There can be no doubt as to the right of the pursuers to assist in their demand, unless it be for the two reasons stated by the Bath Street Chapel Congregation in defence to this action.

¹ Hunter v. Luke, June 2, 1846, 8 D. 787, 18 Scot. Jur. 410; Law v. Meith, Nov. 30, 1855, 18 D. 125, 28 Scot. Jur. 44; Earl of Moray v. Arrol, Nov. 30, 1858, 21 D. 33, 31 Scot. Jur. 19; Walker v. Sherar, Feb. 4, 1870, Macph. 494, 42 Scot. Jur. 225.

² Ness v. Ferrier, May 13, 1825, 4 S. 7; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, Nov. 1829, 8 S. 74, 2 Scot. Jur. 29; Mackenzie v. Morison's Trustees, Nov. 23, 1839 S. 44, 3 Scot. Jur. 33; Rodger v. Russell, June 10, 1873, 11 Macph. 67, 45 Scot. Jur. 417.

No. 140.
June 15, 1877.
Glasgow Royal
Infirmary v.
Wylie, &c.

They say, in the first place, that there is a speciality here in the fact that the feu, at the time when the gable wall was built, belonged to the same person; and that he in building the gable could not create a credit in himself as proprietor of the one feu and a debit against himself as proprietor of the other—that he could not, in short, make himself the debtor and creditor in the same obligation. But it is not necessary to consider what was the effect of anything Mr Sharp did while proprietor. The important question is, what was the effect of his conveyance of the first built-on stance to a purchaser? When he conveyed the stance and building he had erected thereon to the authors of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary I am of opinion that he conveyed along with it a right to demand one-half the cost of the gable wall, whensoever the second stance should be built upon, from the proprietor thereof at the time. That right passed to Mr Sharp's disponee under his conveyance as a pertinent of the property thereby conveyed. Had Mr Sharp continued himself the owner of the built-on stance, and afterwards proceeded to build on it, I think he would have been liable, just as the Bath Street Chapel Congregation are now. Therefore, when he conveyed to the authors of the latter the unoccupied stance gave them a title on the footing on which all building ground within burgh conveyed, viz, that they had right to the adjoining gable as a mutual gable on which to build one-half the price.

But the defenders say, in the second place, that when they bought the unoccupied stance the state of the subjects was such that they were entitled to consider that the debt to the pursuers was discharged, seeing that they found ready buildings of a certain kind on the ground which had taken advantage of the mutual gable. There were certainly some small buildings on the ground, which had taken advantage of the mutual gable to this extent, that they were built against the gable, and that some means of conveying away smoke from them had been devised by inserting pipes into one of the chimneys of the gable. It may be a question whether the owner of an unoccupied stance is entitled to erect any building, however small, taking advantage of the mutual gable, without settling with the party in right of the gable. If the pursuers had said they would not allow you to touch the gable in any way without first settling with them there would have been a good deal to say in support of such a contention. But that is not the form which the question takes here. It is whether the defenders as singular successors were entitled to consider, when they bought the stance, that the condition of them was such as to entitle them to believe that one-half of the gable wall had been paid for. Now, I am of opinion that that was not the state of matters at all, that in fact the natural inference from the existing state of things was the very reverse. No permanent buildings having been erected on the ground, it was, to say the least of it, most unlikely that one-half of the mutual gable had been paid for—so unlikely certainly that the defenders were bound to have satisfied themselves by inquiry as to the facts. I am therefore of opinion that effect must be given to the pursuers' demand.

MR DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

No. 140.

June 15, 1877.
Glasgow Royal
Infirmary v.
Wylie, &c.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—(After the findings in fact quoted in the narrative, p. 895, supra)—"Find in law (1) that the right of the mutual gable was carried in the disposition by Sharp & Craig and is now in pursuers; (2) that the sum payable by the proprietor of the southern stance when he came to use the mutual gable was half the original expense; (3) that the proprietor of the northern tenement had no right to demand payment from the southern proprietor until the latter used the mutual gable; (4) that the erection of the sheds and one-story building in Sharp's time and Scott's time was not such a use as to entitle the defender when purchasing the subjects to assume that the cost of the gable had been already paid; (5) that the gable is now for the first time appropriated by the owners of the defenders' property; (6) that the defenders are therefore liable to the pursuers in half the original expense of the gable: Therefore refuse the appeal," &c.

JOHN GILL, L.A.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 141.

June 16, 1877.
Cox Brothers
v. Jackson and
Lamb.

COX BROTHERS (Pursuers), Respondents.—Lorimer.
JACKSON AND LAMB (Defenders), Appellants.—Brand.

Sheriff—Debts Recovery Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 96)—Account appended to Summons.—An account appended to a summons in a debts recovery action contained entries of various dates "To goods," with the amount charged at each date. The defender stated as a preliminary defence the plea that the account was not detailed, which the Sheriff repelled. Held that the Sheriff was right in repelling the plea.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Linarkshire.
M.

THIS was an appeal in an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, at the instance of Cox Brothers, tannery and leather factors, against Jackson and Lamb, shoemakers, for payment of the balance of an account.

The account appended to the summons bore—"To Cox Brothers, tannery and leather factors," and contained entries of various dates "To goods," with the amount charged at each date thus :—

"1876. June 9. To goods, £94 3 5."

The defence was thus minuted by the Sheriff-substitute :—

"The defenders' procurator stated the defence to be, First, preliminary—The account sued for is not detailed. On the merits—A denial of owing the sum sued for. The pursuers abide by summons."

The Sheriff-substitute (Scott Moncrieff) repelled the preliminary plea, and the Sheriff (Clark) adhered on appeal.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued :—The object of appending an account to the summons was to give to the defender in a compendious way the information which otherwise would require lengthy condescendence. But the account sued on did not contain information necessary to enable him to meet the case against him. The pursuers' argument, that the invoices must be held to have been appended with the goods at each date, and to contain the information, would be equally to an account with entries "to amount of account rendered."

The Court did not call for a reply.

The Court held that the preliminary plea had been rightly repelled.

¹ Webster v. Alexander, Feb. 15, 1859, 21 D. 509; but see Welsh v. Hebb, Feb. 11, 1847, 9 D. 643.

Lord Shand, who was of opinion that it should have been sustained to No. 141.
the effect of ordering a detailed account to be produced.

APPEAL refused, and case remitted to the Sheriff.

W. ELLIOT ARMSTRONG, L.A.—MACBRAIR & KEITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

June 16, 1877.
Cox Brothers
v. Jackson and
Lamb.

CHARLES ANDREW AITCHISON, Pursuer—Muirhead—Asher—Keir. No. 142.
ISABELLA AITCHISON (John Aitchison's Executrix), Defender.—Balfour—
Mackintosh. June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

Partnership—Joint Interest—Business carried on by a Family.—A family of brothers and sisters resided together, and without any deed of copartnery or definite agreement of any kind employed themselves in various branches of an extensive bakery, cooking, and confectionery business, which had gradually grown out of a small business in which their deceased father had been engaged, and in which his funds (never distributed) had been mainly embarked. Held, in the circumstances of the case, which were very special, that the concern was carried on for the joint behoof of the family, and that each member was entitled to an equal share of the profits.

THIS was an action of count, reckoning, and payment raised in May 1875 by Charles Andrew Aitchison, confectioner in Edinburgh, against his brother, John Aitchison, also confectioner in Edinburgh (now deceased), in which he pursuer called upon the defender to account for his intromissions with the trust-estate of their father, John Aitchison, baker in Edinburgh, who died on 16th January 1823, and with the funds realised from or belonging to the business carried on under the name of J. Aitchison and Sons in Little King Street, Register Street, and Queen Street, Edinburgh, and under the name of George Aitchison in Wemyss Place, Edinburgh, and with the property, stocks, loans, and other investments in which the funds of the said trust-estate and business had been placed, and also with the trust-estate of their mother, Mrs Jean Inderwick or Aitchison, who died on 14th January 1848.

The averments of the pursuer substantially were that from the time of his father's death his business was continued and gradually extended by his widow and children; that after the death of his mother, Alexander, the eldest son, was settled with and paid off, and the business carried on by the other surviving children, either in partnership or for joint behoof, all being equally interested in the business; that the defender began to assist his mother in 1830, and was from the first entrusted with the management of the books of the concern, and that he and his mother during her life received the drawings of the business, and that after her death the defender alone received the drawings and kept the bank accounts of the concern, which he manipulated at pleasure.

The defender maintained that he was not liable to account for his mother's trust-estate, in respect that he was not a trustee under his settlement, and had no intromissions with his estate, nor for the businesses in Little King Street, Register Street, and Wemyss Place, in respect that he took no part in them, and had no intromissions with the funds or profits thereof. With regard to the Queen Street business, which was the most important subject in dispute, he averred that the pursuer was never a partner therein, but that, on the contrary, it had belonged exclusively to his mother, his brother James, and himself, until shortly before his mother's death, when it was made over to James and himself, and that since James's death in 1866 he had been the sole partner. He also in his defences refused to account for the estate of his mother, in respect that he was only one of her executors, and had no separate intromissions with her

2D DIVISION.
Id. Curriehill.
I.

No. 142.
—
June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

estate, and stated a plea of all parties not called, but this plea was not insisted in. He also maintained that the pursuer's claim for an accounting in regard to the estates of their father and mother was excluded by certain family arrangements, and actings which he alleged had followed thereon.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the parties a proof of their averments, "under reservation of all objections to the competency of parole proof as regards the averments, which, it may be maintained, are only provable by writ or oath, and also under reservation of all mere questions of accounting."

The result of the proof was shortly as follows:—John Aitchison, the father of the parties, was a baker in Edinburgh, and carried on business in two shops, one in Little King Street and the other in East Register Street. He was survived by his wife and by six sons and three daughters whose names and ages at their father's death in 1823 were,—Alexander, 24; James, 22; John (the defender), 20; Isabella, 18; George, 16; William, 13; Margaret, 10; Charles (the pursuer), 8; and Catherine, 4. He left a trust-disposition and settlement of his means and estate, specially including his stock in trade, in favour of his widow in liferent and his children in fee, in such proportions as his widow might direct, she having the power to deprive any of the children of the whole or any part of their shares. Mrs Aitchison was named an executor along with the trustees. The personal estate left by John Aitchison senior amounted to about £1300, in addition to which he was possessed of the two shops in which the business was carried on, and two other small shops in Catherine Street.

The trustees under John Aitchison senior's settlement handed over to his widow his whole trust-estate, in order that she might carry on the business for behoof of the family. Mrs Aitchison, who was a person of great energy and business capacity, along with her sons, Alexander and James who were of full age, continued her husband's business in Little King Street and Register Street, under the firm of "Mrs Aitchison and Sons" or "J. Aitchison and Sons," her name being Jean. In 1828 she took a lease of the shop No. 77 Queen Street, and house above it, which she afterwards purchased, and there she and her son James commenced a confectionery business, which gradually became one of the largest and most successful of the kind in Edinburgh.

The other sons as they grew up all came in one capacity or another to take part in the business. When the Queen Street shop was opened George was put in charge of the Register Street shop, and Alexander took charge of the Little King Street shop. The name of the firm in Queen Street was the same as before, "Aitchison and Sons," or "Jean Aitchison and Sons," and for some years the whole three shops were managed as one concern, the drawings being regularly taken to or accounted for to Mrs Aitchison.

In 1830 the defender, who had been a clerk in a wine merchant's office, gave up his situation at his mother's desire, and came to assist her in Queen Street in keeping the books and attending customers. No written contract of copartnership was ever executed between Mrs Aitchison and her sons, but the defender produced in process two indentures, one dated in 1830, and the other in 1833, between the firm of "Aitchison and Sons" and apprentices employed by them, in which the masters were designed as "Mrs Jean Aitchison, James Aitchison, and John Aitchison, carrying on business under the firm of Aitchison and Sons, confectioners in Edinburgh." No indentures subsequent to 1833 were produced.

In 1832 George Aitchison left the Register Street shop and went to the shop at the corner of Wemyss Place and Albyn Place, nearly opposite Queen Street. He there began the business of a baker, ostensibly in the own name. It was one of the questions in the present case whether, as the defender maintained, this Wemyss Place shop was a separate concern, in which George alone was interested, he having no interest in the Queen Street business, or whether, as the pursuer maintained, it was truly a branch of the concern of Aitchison and Sons. The Wemyss Place business was sold in 1865, and upon the death of his brother James in 1866 George took the place which James had occupied in the Queen Street establishment, namely, the superintendence of the cooking department, and continued to fill that place till his own death in 1874.

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

In 1835 Alexander, the eldest son, was married, and an arrangement as came to by which the baking business carried on in Little King Street and Register Street was made over entirely to him, he paying a rent to his mother for the use of the premises.

After Alexander's marriage the pursuer, who had been assisting in the Register Street shop, entered the Queen Street establishment, where he remained actively engaged in the business until shortly before the present tion was raised. He superintended the confectionery department, and was clearly proved, notwithstanding an attempt on the part of the defender to make out that the pursuer's services were of little value, that he was a very skilful compounder of creams, ices, jellies, and cakes, for which the establishment acquired a great reputation. After the pursuer came to the Queen Street James devoted himself to the practical superintendence of the cooking department.

About the same year, William, who had been in an architect's office, joined the Queen Street establishment, and gave his whole time to the business until his death in 1874. His principal duty was to superintend the packing of confectionery, and to assist in the saleroom.

About the same time also Isabella, the eldest daughter, came to the shop, where she assisted in the sale department.

In 1846 the pursuer was sued for damages for breach of promise of marriage by a Miss Tucker. The case went to trial, and a verdict was returned for Miss Tucker. The summons had libelled the defender (the pursuer) as a partner of the firm of Aitchison and Sons, but the defences, which were framed chiefly by the instructions of John James, it was stated that the defender was not a partner, and that the pursuer had sought to entrap him in the erroneous belief that he was a partner.

In consequence of this entanglement Mrs Aitchison, who had previously made a settlement in favour of her children equally, executed a deed, dated 6th May 1847, by which she excluded the pursuer from all share in her succession, and, of the same date, in virtue of the powers given her by her husband's settlement, she executed a deed excluding the pursuer from all share in that estate. It was in evidence that Mrs Aitchison always believed that her power of distribution extended not only over the original stock of her husband's estate, but over the business which had grown out of it, and that this belief was shared by the members of the family.

On 23d December 1847, twelve days before Mrs Aitchison's death, and when she was in very infirm health, a document, bearing to be a minute of agreement, was entered into between her and her sons James and George, in which these three persons were designed "as the only partners in the company in business as confectioners in No. 77 Queen Street, Edinburgh," in the following terms:—"The said parties having agreed to dissolve the said copartnership as at the term of Martinmas last 1847, the same is hereby held as dissolved at that date accordingly, and it is declared that the said Mrs Jane Inderwick or Aitchison retired from the said copartnership as at the term of Martinmas last, and that her good-

No. 142. will and interest in the business now belongs to the said James and John Aitchison."

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

Mrs Aitchison died on 4th January 1848, leaving personal estate to the value of about £1300, and heritable estate worth about £2000. Her sons, Alexander, James, John, George, and William, and her daughter Isabella were named executors.

A meeting of the whole family was held on 27th November thereafter, of which the following minute was drawn up by Mr W. R. Baillie, W.S., the family agent:—"Mr Alex. Aitchison stated that the present meeting had been called for the purpose of reading the settlement of the late Mrs Aitchison, and taking the other steps which were necessary thereon."

"Mr Baillie then produced a disposition by Mrs Aitchison, dated 26th October 1830, in favour of her children, and codicil thereto annexed, dated 6th May 1847, and also a writing executed by her on the date last mentioned, in reference to her husband's trust-disposition. These deeds were then read.

"There was then also produced to the meeting and read a minute of agreement between the deceased and James and John Aitchison, her sons, in reference to the dissolution of the copartnership between them, dated 27th December 1847.

"The meeting considering that the codicil before mentioned, which recalled the said disposition in so far as it included the said Charles Andrew Aitchison and the heirs of his body, had been executed by the deceased in consequence of special causes which had now ceased to exist, and that the deceased had also resolved, if she had been spared, to cancel the said codicil, agreed and hereby agree to hold the said codicil as cancelled, to renounce all benefit which they and each of them may or might derive under it, and to divide the estate of the deceased, heritable and moveable, in the same manner as if such codicil had never been executed, and also to execute all deeds which may be necessary for carrying this writing into full effect. The meeting also for the same causes agreed and hereby agree to hold the other writing before mentioned, dated the same day as said codicil, as cancelled, to renounce all benefit which they and each of them may or might derive under it, and to divide the estate of their deceased father, heritable and moveable, in the same manner as if such writing had never been executed, and also to execute all writings or deeds which may be necessary for carrying this minute into full effect."

The minute was signed by all the members of the family then alive except Alexander, who was present but did not sign. Neither he nor any of the others appear to have taken any objection to the minute of dissolution on the ground that it erroneously stated Mrs Aitchison, and her sons James and John, as having been the sole partners of the Queen Street business. The pursuer in his evidence explained this by saying that Alexander frequently complained that he was not satisfied with what had been done for him at his marriage, and that he was making further claims when John and James resisted, and that James told him (the pursuer) that the minute of dissolution had been got by them from their mother to stop Alexander's claims, and that it would never be used against the other members of the family, and that it was read merely to frighten Alexander, who was then claiming to be a partner in the Queen Street business.

Alexander continued to press his claims, and ultimately they were settled by the following "minute of agreement between Alexander Aitchison, baker in Edinburgh, on the first part, and John Aitchison, confectioner in Edinburgh, on the part of his other brothers and sisters, and taking burden for them, on the second part:—1. The subjects in Leith, King Street, in Catherine Street, and shop in East Register Street, what severally belonged to the late Mr John Aitchison, or to his widow or family, and also one share of the Stockbridge Mill Company, are to be henceforth the property of Alexander Aitchison, and his brothers and sister are at their expense to concur in making them over to him, and he is to be infeft therein at their expense. 2. The remainder of the property of the late John Aitchison, or of his widow and family, including the subjects in Broughton Street, is to be henceforth the property of the other members of the family, and they are at their own expense to receive from Alexander Aitchison all deeds which may be necessary for fully vesting them therein. 3. On these objects being accomplished, Alexander Aitchison is to grant a full discharge of all claims that he may have against his brothers and sister of any kind whatever, and they are to grant a similar discharge to him of all claims they may have against him of any kind whatever, which discharges shall be at the expense of the second party solely."

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

In implement of this deed Alexander made up titles as heir of his mother in the premises No. 77 Queen Street, and by disposition dated 10th April 1852 conveyed the same to his remaining brothers and sister.

With the exception of Alexander none of the family ever married. The unmarried members continued to live together as one family and in great harmony until after the death of William in August 1874. Disagreements subsequently arose between the survivors (the pursuer, the defender, andabella),* caused apparently by the fact that George and William had made separate wills in favour of the pursuer, each of the family having previously made a will in favour of the survivors. From the father's death in 1823 down to the date of Alexander's marriage in 1835 the profits of the four establishments were regularly paid over to Mrs Aitchison, and applied by her for the joint behoof. After the latter date, Alexander received for his own use the drawings of the Little King Street and Register Street shops, while the profits of the other two establishments were paid to Mrs Aitchison, and after her death to the defender, and applied for behoof of all the family except Alexander. None of them ever received anything in the shape of wages, but whatever was required for clothing or other necessaries was paid to them by the defender, either out of the till in Queen Street, or by cheque upon an account in the National Bank, into which all the earnings of the several businesses were paid. Out of the accumulated drawings investments of various kinds, particularly purchases of house property, were made by the defender, sometimes with and sometimes without consultation with his brothers and sister, the titles being taken either in the names of the whole surviving brothers and sister except Alexander, or in the names of two or more of them, a few only being taken in the name of an individual. No principle was apparent in the way in which the names were selected, but the defender stated in his evidence that when Alexander was paid off the rest of the family agreed each to execute a mortis causa settlement, by which everything which he or she should die possessed of should go to the rest of the family and the survivors, and that shortly after the date of the agreement each of the family executed a will in these terms, and the whole were taken by the defender into his own custody, and he explained that as the property of every member of the family would thus come to the survivor it was immaterial how the funds of each were invested, and that he, therefore, on the faith of these wills, invested the funds of Aitchison and Company,

* Margaret died young, soon after her father; Catherine died in 1849; James in 1866; Alexander in 1873; George in January 1874; and William in August 1874.

No. 142. which he says belonged to himself and James alone, in the way described. In whatever way the titles to the investments were taken the rents and dividends were as a rule collected by the defender and paid into the general bank account. Among other properties a villa, called Mount Vernon, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, was purchased in 1854, and the title taken in the names of all the members of the family except Alexander. The family resided there in summer, and large quantities of fruit were grown in the gardens there under glass, all of which was used for the purposes of the Queen Street business.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

About the year 1860 or 1861 George Aitchison discontinued taking the drawings of the Wemyss Place shop to Queen Street, and accumulated the cash in tin boxes in a cupboard in his shop, till it amounted to at least £6000. At length he was alarmed by an attempt to break into the premises, which induced him to deposit the money in bank. He did not, however, pay it into the general account with the National Bank, but deposited it in three sums of £2000 each in the Royal Bank in the names of his brothers William and the pursuer and himself respectively, and his subsequent drawings and the sum which he received in 1865 from the sale of the business were applied either in making investments in his own name, or in payment to his brothers Charles and William. It appears from the evidence that George resorted to this expedient, in order to bring pressure to bear on the defender, whom he had repeatedly asked to exhibit a balance-sheet, but which he could not obtain. George's conduct did not, however, seem to disturb his amicable relations with the defender, who continued as before to make investments out of the general fund in the names of members of the family, including George.

The grounds on which the parties supported their respective contentions will be found fully explained in the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, dated 5th December 1876, which was as follows:—"Finds that the defender is bound to hold count and reckoning with the pursuer for his various intrusions, in terms of the conclusions of the summons; but finds that in such count and reckoning the funds realised from the business carried on under the name of George Aitchison, in Wemyss Place, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, in so far as received by the said George Aitchison, now deceased, by the late William Aitchison, and by the pursuer, or any of them, and not accounted for in the general fund managed by the defender, must be accounted for by the pursuer, and taken into the general account; appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the accounting may be proceeded with; reserves all questions of expenses, and grants leave to the defender to reclaim, if so advised."*

* "NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts, the substance of which has been given above)—The principal question now for decision is, for whose behoof were the businesses in Queen Street and Wemyss Place carried on after 1835? The pursuer maintains that they were all one concern, and were carried on for behoof of the whole family; the defender, on the other hand, maintains that the business in Wemyss Place was carried on by George solely for his own behoof, and that none of the other members of the family had any interest in that business, and that the business in Queen Street belonged entirely to Mrs Aitchison, James, and the defender, as the sole partners thereof, until shortly before Mrs Aitchison's death, when, in virtue of an agreement between her and the two alleged partners, the whole business was transferred to them, and was thenceforth their exclusive property, and that neither George, William, Charles, or Isabella had any interest in it whatever.

"After the best consideration which I have been able to give to the matter, both oral and documentary, I have come to be of opinion that it is not proved

The defender reclaimed, but before the reclaiming note came on for No. 142. hearing he died, and his sister, Miss Isabella Aitchison, was sisted in his room as his executrix and representative.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

that there was any proper partnership entered into between Mrs Aitchison and her sons, or any of them ; but that it is proved that until 1835 the business in Little King Street, East Register Street, Queen Street, and Wemyss Place, and after that date until Mrs Aitchison's death, the businesses in Queen Street and Wemyss Place, were all truly branches of one concern—that they had all derived their existence from the as yet undivided estate of old John Aitchison, the father, and that they were carried on by the widow and her sons and a daughter for behoof of the whole family—the mother being interested in the liferent, and the sons and daughter in the fee in equal shares, but with power to the mother to diminish the share of any child, and even to exclude the child altogether ; and that from Mrs Aitchison's death the Queen Street business until now, and the Wemyss Place business until it was discontinued in 1865, were carried on by the surviving brothers and sister, other than Alexander, for their joint behoof. I shall now explain the grounds of this opinion.

“In the first place it may not unreasonably be presumed that where a business in which a deceased father of a family had been engaged, and in which his funds had been almost wholly embarked, is without any distribution of any part of his estate among his children carried on after his death by his widow and the grown-up sons (the other children being in minority or pupillarity), the business, until a distribution takes place, is so carried on for behoof of the widow and all the children in proportion to their respective interests in the estate.

“In the second place, this presumption derives, in the present case, very great support from the circumstance that, without any distribution of the estate beyond paying off the eldest son in the manner to be afterwards noticed, the business was conducted from the date of the father's death, and for a period of half a century, on the footing of introducing into it from time to time as they grew up, and in one capacity or another, every member of the family, each giving his or her whole time to their respective departments, and all, excepting the eldest son, who alone of the family ever married, living together during their joint lives.”

(His Lordship then referred to the way in which the profits of the different shops were dealt with, and the investments therefrom made, and to the unlikelihood that the use of the premises in Queen Street or of the Mount Vernon fruit would have been given by the other members of the family for the purposes of the business in Queen Street without charge, unless that was a business in which they were all equally interested, and proceeded)—“From what has been said, I think it is plain (1) that until 1835 the business of all the four establishments were carried on as one concern, and for the joint behoof of the whole family ; (2) that from 1835 till after Mrs Aitchison's death in 1848 the business in Queen Street and Wemyss Place was carried on for behoof of all the family, except Alexander, who received for his own use the drawings of Little King Street and Register Street ; (3) that ever since Mrs Aitchison's death the Queen Street business has been carried on upon the same footing. The question remains, however, for whose behoof was the Wemyss Place business carried on after 1848 ?”

(After a review of the evidence on this part of the case his Lordship proceeded)—“It appears to me that the evidence on this branch of the case, when read in the light of the other circumstances already adverted to, leads to the conclusion that the two establishments were but one concern, carried on under different names, but truly for behoof of the same members of the family.

“It is necessary, however, now to notice the arguments maintained by the defender against that conclusion. In the first place, he maintains that it is proved by a written document, to which, however, his mother and his brother James were alone parties, that the Queen Street business belonged to them, and to them alone—to the exclusion of all the other members of the family. The circum-

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

Argued for the defender ;—The claim of the pursuer to an equal share in the business must rest on one of two grounds, (1) that he was a partner of stances under which that document was executed require some attention. It appears that for some time before his mother's death, Alexander, the eldest son, had been dissatisfied with the share of the family property which had been assigned to him by his mother in 1835 in the shape of the goodwill and profits of the shops in Little King Street and Register Street—and had been claiming, or threatening to claim, to participate in the profits of Queen Street and Wemyss Place. Mrs Aitchison was at this time laid aside from business, and was in very infirm health, and a document (No. 7 of pro.), bearing to be a minute of agreement, was entered into between her and her sons James and John, in which they are designed as 'all residing in Queen Street, Edinburgh, and the only partners of the company carrying on business as confectioners in No. 77 Queen Street, Edinburgh.' The terms of the said agreement were as follows :—'The said parties having agreed to dissolve the said copartnership as at the term of Martinmas 1847, the same is hereby held as dissolved as at that date accordingly, and it is also declared that the said Mrs Jean Inderwick or Aitchison retired from the said copartnership as at the said term of Martinmas last, and that her goodwill and interest in the business now belonged to the said James and John Aitchison.' This document, which is dated 23d December 1847, undoubtedly raises a presumption in favour of the defender's contention ; but that is a presumption which may be overcome by the other facts in the case. In considering this part of the case it is material to bear in mind that Mrs Aitchison had the power under her husband's settlement of excluding any of her children from participation in the father's estate, and it appears that about, or shortly before, the date of this document, she had exercised this power by a codicil to her own will, and by a separate writing relating to her husband's estate, whereby she excluded the pursuer from all share in either her own or her husband's estate, although she had previously intended the whole to be divided equally among all her children, all of whom appear to have regarded the property which the mother had accumulated, and the business in which she was engaged, as truly her husband's estate, enlarged no doubt by her good management and the aid of her children, but still her husband's estate. In the light, at all events, the pursuer regarded the matter—for shortly before the event took place in his history which must not be lost sight of. He was in 1846 sued for damages for breach of promise of marriage by a certain Miss Eliza Tucker, and it was in consequence of the scrape into which he had thus got that his mother excluded him from all participation in his father's estate and her own. The case went to trial, and the jury returned a verdict for the pursuer (Miss Tucker) for £200—but she accepted a less sum, and assigned her decree on 31st December 1847 to his brother Alexander, who appears to have advanced the amount. The action had libelled the defender (the present pursuer) as a partner of the firm of Aitchison and Sons, but in the defence it was stated that he was not a partner of that firm, and upon this circumstance the present defender now founds, as proving his case that the pursuer was not then and never was a partner. Now, even if it were necessary for the pursuer to now to make out that there was a proper partnership between him and the other members of the family, I do not think that the statement made for his defence against Miss Tucker's action can be so used against him. Technically perhaps the statement was perfectly true, inasmuch as no formal contract of copartnership had ever been entered into by the pursuer or anybody else. But the defences seem to have been the composition, not so much of the pursuer as of Mr Wotherspoon, S.S.C., his agent, with the assistance of James and John, who desired to get the pursuer out of the country pending the litigation, and the statement in question was made after the pursuer had explained to his agent the position which he held, of being interested in the family property, including the business—but only in expectancy, as being subject to exclusion by his mother, if she should see fit to exclude him.

"Thus, while I think the statement made for the present pursuer is true the firm of Aitchison and Sons, or (2) that the profits of the business were held by the defender in trust for behoof of the pursuer and the rest of the

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.

Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

action was literally true at the time it was made, it cannot prevent him from now maintaining that he is, and has all along been, interested in the family property and business, and for that purpose it is not necessary for him to make out a contract of copartnership with his mother or his brothers and sister.

"After this, Mrs Aitchison died on 4th January 1848, and a meeting of the family was held on 27th November thereafter, called by Alexander for the purpose of, inter alia, reading the settlement of Mrs Aitchison. Mr W. R. Baillie, W.S., produced the settlement, dated in 1830, and the codicil thereto, dated 6th August 1847, and the relative writing of same date dealing with her husband's estate, all of which were read to the meeting. There was then also produced to the meeting the minute of agreement, dated 23d December 1847, in reference to the dissolution of the copartnership between Mrs Aitchison and her sons James and John. Thereafter, on the narrative that the codicil and other writing referred to, in so far as dealing with the pursuer and the heirs of his body, had 'been executed by the deceased in consequence of special causes' (i.e. the pursuer's entanglement with Miss Tucker, and the proceedings against him & her instance), 'which had now ceased to exist, and that the deceased had also resolved, if she had been spared, to cancel' the said codicil and other writing, the meeting agreed to hold the same as cancelled, and to renounce all benefit which they and each of them might derive under the same, and to divide the state of the deceased, heritable and moveable, in the same manner as if such codicil had never been executed, and also to execute all deeds which might be necessary for carrying the minute into full effect. Now, this minute is signed by all the members of the family then alive, excepting Alexander, and neither one nor any of his brothers or sister stated any objections to the minute of dissolution, on the ground that it incorrectly stated Mrs Aitchison and her sons James and John as having been the sole partners in the Queen Street business, and James and John as being now the sole partners. And so far the minute is in favour of the defender's views. But upon this point Charles gives an explanation, the import of which is, that Alexander had frequently complained that he was not satisfied with what had been done for him at his marriage, and that at the time of his mother's death he was making further claims which John and James resisted; and that James told him (the pursuer), that the minute of dissolution had been got by them from their mother to stop Alexander's claims, and that it would never be used against the other members of the family, and that it was read merely to frighten Alexander, who was then claiming to be a partner in the Queen Street business. Now, I am inclined to believe this story, told by Charles, to be true, both because it is in itself not an improbable one, and because the defender, who was in Court during the whole of the examination of the pursuer, and was himself recalled and examined at great length after the pursuer's examination was concluded, although he denies that he himself said to the pursuer that the document was taken merely to keep Alexander out of the business, admits that Alexander was then making claims, on the ground that he had not got his due share of the family profits, and the rest of the evidence shews that, although Alexander's claims were soon afterwards compromised, the so-called deed of dissolution and transference was never, in point of fact, acted on as regards the other members of the family. I am confirmed in this view by the equivocating way in which the defender explained the transaction between himself and his mother and his brother James, which had resulted in the execution of this minute of dissolution. He at first said that there is no doubt that she got a payment for it,—that he was sure there had been a balance of the books to ascertain her share of the profits, and that a balance-sheet had been made up, and yet, in answer to the immediately succeeding questions, he flatly contradicts himself. He is asked—'(Q.) During all your experience, as having charge of the financial department of that business, did you ever once balance your books? (A.) Never. (Q.) Did you ever make out a balance-sheet in your life? (A.) Never.' And I am satisfied that there never

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.

Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

family. As to the first ground, there were no facts and circumstances from which partnership could be inferred. The pursuer's case was that was any balancing of accounts, or any payment by John and James, or either of them, to Mrs Aitchison to account or in satisfaction of her interest in the business.

"But matters become still more clear when the family arrangement, made in 1851, is considered. Alexander had still been pressing his claims, and the result was that, on 17th March 1851, an agreement was entered into between Alexander Aitchison, of the first part, and 'John Aitchison, confectioner in Edinburgh, on the part of his other brothers and sister, and taking burden for them, on the second part.' By that agreement the claims of Alexander were compromised by his accepting, as his share of the family property (or, as it is termed in the agreement, the property 'of the late John Aitchison, or of his widow or family'), the subjects in Little King Street, Catherine Street, and Register Street, and agreeing to grant a full discharge of all his claims against the other members of the family, of any kind whatever, while the remainder of the said family property, i.e., 'the property of the late John Aitchison, or his widow and family,' was thenceforth to be the property of the other members of the family, who were to be at the sole expense of all deeds necessary for carrying the agreement into effect. It is maintained by the defender that neither the business in Queen Street nor that in Wemyss Place was in contemplation of the parties to the agreement. But I cannot accept that interpretation of the document, because the property which was here divided between Alexander, on the one hand, and the other members of the family, on the other, was the whole estate which had belonged to their father, John Aitchison, or to their mother Mrs Aitchison, and which then belonged to the family—i.e., to the family dividually and collectively. . . . I think, therefore, that the fair meaning of this agreement was that Alexander, in consideration of his discharging all claims which he might have had for farther participation with his brothers and sister in the family property above enumerated, received, as his share of that property in addition to the businesses in Little King Street and Register Street, of which he had been in the exclusive possession for sixteen years, the subjects in Little King Street, Catherine Street, and Register Street, and left the whole of the remainder, including the businesses at Wemyss Place and Queen Street, to be dealt with by them as their own property, in which all were equally interested. But, farther, this deed was acted upon and implemented, on the part of Alexander, who had made up titles as heir of his mother in the premises No. 77 Queen Street, where the confectionery business was carried on, and the house above No. 76, in which the family resided, by his conveying the same, on 10th April 1852, to his brothers James, John, George, William, and Charles, and his sister Isabella, and their respective heirs and assignees. Now, what followed upon this agreement on the part of the other members of the family is most instructive. On 27th May 1851 the house No. 75 Queen Street was purchased in name of James, John, William, Charles, George, and Isabella at the price of £1600; and on 9th June 1854 Mount Vernon was purchased in name of the same six persons at the price of £5500, the price in both instances being paid out of the general bank account kept in name of Aitchison and Sons; and various other houses and stocks were all from time to time purchased out of the same common fund, the titles being taken sometimes in name of the whole family other than Alexander, sometimes in the name of two or more members, a few small investments only being occasionally purchased in the individual names of George, of the pursuer, or of the defender. But in whatever names the titles to the property and stocks were taken, the rents and dividends were, as a rule, collected by John, who in financial matters acted for the whole family, and were by him paid into the general bank account as a common fund. I am, therefore, of opinion that, whatever weight might have been given to the minute of dissolution and transference of partnership in 1847, had it stood alone, it was not acted on, and was entirely superseded by the family agreement of 1851, in was a partner from the date of his father's death, or at least, from his majority, but his own acts, as well as the other evidence in the case,

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.

Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

acted as that has been by the subsequent actings of the defender himself, and his brothers and sister.

"But, in the second place, the defender maintains that the idea that the Wemyss Place business was a part of the common concern is negatived by the actings of George Aitchison, in whose name alone that business was carried on. It appears that in 1860 or 1861, a few years before that business was given up, George discontinued taking over his drawings to Queen Street and throwing them into the common fund, and accumulated the cash in tin boxes, which he kept in a cupboard in his shop in Wemyss Place until it amounted to at least £1000, or according to the defender to £10,000; and he would apparently have gone on hoarding the money in that fashion had he not been alarmed by an almost successful attempt at burglary, which induced him to deposit it in the bank. He did not, however, pay it into the general account kept in the National Bank, but he seems to have divided it between himself and his brothers William and James, £2000 having been deposited in the Royal Bank in the name of each, and his subsequent drawings and the sum which he obtained from Mr. Mill, to whom he sold the business in 1865, appears to have been applied either in making investments in his own name or in payment to his brothers Charles and William. This, however, is explained by the pursuer in his evidence to have arisen from a suspicion which these three brothers had come to entertain of the defender, in his financial management of the common fund, was taking no good care of himself, George having repeatedly asked the defender to exhibit a balance-sheet, which, however, he could not obtain. The defender denies that a balance-sheet had ever been asked, but I think it is in the circumstances highly probable that such a demand was made, and that George's reason for accumulating the Wemyss Place drawings in his shop instead of handing them to the defender was to prevent further funds going into the defender's hands until he had explained his past actings, but that he intended on receiving proper explanation to hand the amount to the defender. And it is not a little remarkable, although George's proceedings appear all to have been known to the defender, he still continued, until the death of George in 1874, to invest the fund accumulating from time to time in the National Bank account, kept by him in the name of Aitchison and Son, in purchasing property and stock in name of the different members of the family, including George. This is admitted by him in his evidence, and is very clearly brought out by the list of investments contained in pp. 82 to 84 of the Joint Print, from which it appears that between the years 1863 and 1867 sums amounting in all to not less than £20,750 were applied in purchasing house property in the names of James, John, George, William, Charles, and Isabella, in equal proportions, the name of James being omitted in purchases made after his death in 1866. Now, all this is quite inexplicable on the theory of the defender. If it had been the case that he and James, till the death of the latter in 1866, and the defender himself after that date, were the sole partners of and persons interested in the firm of Aitchison and Son, and the Queen Street business, and if George had no interest in that business, it is quite inconceivable that he would have gone on making these large investments in the way above described with funds in which, according to his own evidence, none of the other members of the family, and least of all George, had the slightest interest. On the other hand, all that was done is just what might have been expected to have been done if the pursuer's theory be, as I think it is, the correct one. I cannot doubt that the defender went on making these investments after George discontinued to pay the drawings into the common account simply because he knew that George had a right to demand the account, or which he was pressing, and he therefore did not venture to insist upon George handing over his drawings while he himself was refusing to account for his past. He says that he made the investments 'to keep the family together,' and, I take it, is another way of saying that he did it 'to stop their mouths'

No. 142. made it clear that he was not a partner during his mother's lifetime, and nothing subsequently occurred which could give him that position. As

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

by an occasional payment to account, and thus to defer the day of general reckoning.

"But it is here right to notice another explanation given by the defender of his reason for making these investments. It is this:—He says that when the rest of the family combined to get Alexander paid off, and his claims discharged they agreed that each should execute a mortis causa settlement, by which every thing of which he or she should die possessed should go to the other member of the family and the survivor, excepting Alexander, and that shortly after the date of the agreement each of the family executed a will in those terms, and the whole were taken by the defender into his own custody. And he says that the property of every member of the family would thus come to the survivor, it was immaterial how the funds of each were invested, and that he therefore, on the faith of these wills, invested the funds of Aitchison and Co., which he says belonged to himself and James alone, in the way already described. The only one of these wills which has been printed is that executed by James, who was the first decesser, and who died in 1866; and assuming the other wills to be similarly expressed, it appears that these were not mutual settlements. None of them refers to the settlements executed by the other members of the family, and each reserves full power to the grantor at any time to alter, innovate, revoke, or annul the settlement. I therefore can attach no weight whatever to the defender's argument that James and he made the family investments referred to on the faith of his being in possession of these several wills.

"Before concluding, I should also notice that the defender, in support of his pleas, that the confectionery business of 'Aitchison and Sons' belonged exclusively to his mother and his brother James, and himself, has produced two or three indentures between that firm and apprentices, in which partnerships are referred to. The first indenture is with Mr Ramsay, and is dated 19th November 1833 at which time the business was carried on exclusively in Little King Street and Register Street. The masters are here described as 'Mrs Jean Aitchison, widow of John Aitchison, lately baker there, Alexander Aitchison and James Aitchison, bakers there, carrying on business under the firm of Mrs Aitchison and Sons.' The other two indentures are dated 29th May 1830 and 29th November 1833 respectively, after the Queen Street business was started. The masters are there described as 'Mrs Jean Aitchison, James Aitchison, and John Aitchison, carrying on business under the firm of Aitchison and Sons, confectioners in Edinburgh.' Now, it is remarkable that no indentures after 1833 have been produced. The defender says they had no apprentices after that time, but that must be a mistake, because the evidence shews that at all events up to 1851 there were always several apprentices—certainly more than two. At this is really a matter of little moment, because until 1833, when the last indenture produced was entered into, Mrs Aitchison and her eldest three sons, Alexander, James, and John, were, excepting George, the only members of the family who were from their age qualified to carry on business, or to undertake the teaching of apprentices. The other members of the family were either engaged in other occupations, or were as yet too young, and George was not a partner; and although the fact that Mrs Aitchison and certain of her sons put themselves out to their apprentices, and even to the public, as carrying on a confectionery business under a social firm, would have undoubtedly made them liable to the public as partners, it does not, as between the members of the family, create any presumption that such partnership was for their own benefit alone. At all events any presumption so created must yield to the facts.

"Now, I think that the facts proved in this case abundantly establish that although Mrs Aitchison and her sons, James and John, may have chosen to call themselves partners, they carried on their business, not for their own benefit alone, but for behoof of all the other members of the family; and that, as the members successively came into the business, and devoted their time and attention to it, they were in reality, though not perhaps in form or in name, part-the second ground of action, that could only be proved by the writ or oath of the alleged trustee.¹ Parole evidence was incompetent, but even if it was admissible there was no sufficient evidence to establish the pursuer's case. No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was not necessary for the pursuer's case that he should be able to specify the date at which he became a partner. There was nothing to prevent a person "growing into a partner." Be it as it might, the pursuer's case was the not uncommon one of a person being made a partner in his infancy. Such a person when he came of age had it in his option either to repudiate or to adopt what had been done for him.² Mrs Aitchison's belief as to the extent of the powers which she possessed under her husband's settlement, a belief which was shared by the rest of the family, was quite sufficient to explain the fact that during her lifetime the pursuer was not very clear about his own position as a partner. Whatever her powers were, the minute of 27th November 1848 placed the pursuer in precisely the same position as if the deed excluding him had never been executed. The facts and circumstances pointed out by the Lord Ordinary were enough to establish that the pursuer was a partner. Even if he was not so in a legal and mercantile sense, the agreement of 17th March 1851 satisfied the requirements of the Act 1696, and shewed that the business, whoever were the nominal partners, was carried on for the joint behoof. At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I shall not attempt in giving my opinion on this important and difficult case to state in any detail the import of the voluminous evidence which has been led, or the material facts which it discloses. They have all gone over with great care and accuracy in the note of the Lord Ordinary,

Indeed, I think it is clear that, after 1835, at all events after 1851, if the firm of Aitchison and Sons had got into difficulties, every one of the sons or daughters would, when the facts came to be inquired into, have been held liable for the debts of the concern as partners, in respect of their interest in the capital and profits of the business.

On the whole matter, therefore, I think that the defender is bound to hold it and reckoning with the pursuer in all the matters specified in the conclusions of the summons. The estate of John Aitchison, the father, formed undoubtedly the capital out of which the present business was created, and the defender by joining his mother in managing that business is liable to account for the original capital, none of which can be said to have been dissipated by the time. Then, as a surviving executor of his mother, and as the representative of her estate, his brother, another executor, and as undoubtedly an intramitter with her estate, and as indeed admittedly the general financial manager for the whole family, he is bound to account for his intromissions with her estate. And, as the general financial manager of the business of Aitchison and Sons, which his brothers and sister were equally interested, he is bound to account for his intromissions therewith, including the drawings from Wemyss Place, so far as received by him, or accounted for to the general fund under his management. But as George Aitchison withheld some of these drawings for some time, and as the amount so withheld was either appropriated by George or given to his brother William and the pursuer, and as the pursuer represents of his said brothers, it is necessary, in order to do justice to all concerned, that the drawings, in so far as not received by the defender, should now be accounted for by the pursuer, and taken into account in the general count and finding.

Statute 1696, c. 25.

Call's Coms. ii. p. 624, (5th ed.); Lindley on Partnership, pp. 82, 84.

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

and we have had the advantage of a very able and exhaustive argument from the bar on their import. I shall content myself with simply referring to the more salient features of the history of this singular family, and then address myself to the not less singular questions which that history has raised for our decision. The outline of the career of the family is shortly as follows:—John Aitchison, the father of the family, was a baker in Edinburgh, in respectable but a humble enough position, having two shops, one in Little King Street, and the other in Register Street; he died in 1823 leaving a widow and nine children. Besides the goodwill of the business, he was possessed at his death of some house property, consisting of the shop and dwelling-house in Little King Street, and two other shops in Catherine Street, and personalty amounting to between £1300 and £1400. He left a trust-settlement under which the widow was to have the life interest of the whole estate, and the fee was to go to the children in such proportions as she might think fit. The widow, who was also executrix, seems to have been an energetic and enterprising woman. She carried on her husband's business from 1823 to 1828 in the old establishments, when she removed to a shop in Queen Street, in which from that year to the present time a trade in confectionery has been carried on by the family. The eldest of the sons was Alexander. He married early, and confined himself to the old baking business in his father's shops, for which he paid a rent to his mother. All the rest of the family continued to live together until the death of their mother in 1848, with the exception of one of the daughters who died early. The Queen Street business flourished greatly, and it was carried on under the designation of Jean Aitchison and Sons. There seems no doubt that in 1831 Mrs Aitchison had assumed her two sons, James and John, formally as partners, and they are named as such in an indenture dated in 1833. George Aitchison, another of the sons, opened a business as a baker in Wemyss Place about 1832, which turned out a very profitable concern, and was given up in 1865 or 1866. It appears that although James and John were the only two ostensible partners, all the rest of the family assisted in the business in Queen Street. Charles, the pursuer of this action, was the youngest of the family. He became a skilful confectioner, and there seems little doubt that the prosperity of the Queen Street business was greatly indebted to him, but it does not appear that he had any specific allowance for his labour in the shop, nor any specific footing arranged in writing. He was eight years old at the date of his father's death, and at his mother's death in 1848 was consequently thirty-two years of age.

There was but one bank account kept for the firm, and whoever were the partners entitled to operate on it, of which I shall afterwards speak, it seems sufficiently proved that from this account came all the funds by which the members of the Aitchison family were maintained, with the exception of Alexander, the eldest, and of George, who had his separate establishment. I rather gather from the result of the evidence that so close and intimate were the relations of the family to each other, and so complete the confidence which subsisted between them, that they obtained from John or James such money as they wanted for current use, and from time to time many investments were made, particularly the purchase of house property, in the names of different members of the family, all the funds for which came out of the profits of the Queen Street business, aided by very large sums contributed by George from the business in Wemyss Place. This was the state of the family in 1848, when the mother died. Passing over for the present some important events which happened at the eriod. It is enough to say that the family continued to live together, the business to be conducted with great success on the same footing, and investments to be made in the same way until 1874. Previous to this the family had made separate settlements in favour of each other. By the last-mentioned date they had all died excepting John, Charles, and Isabella, when for the first time disagreement arose between them, caused apparently by the fact that George and James had made separate wills in favour of Charles, the pursuer. The result was that Charles raised an action against John for the purpose of obtaining an account of the profits of the business, and claiming an equal share therein with his other brothers and sister excepting Alexander. This claim the Lord Ordinary has sustained, on grounds which he has fully explained in his note.

The claim substantially is rested on two alternative grounds—partnership and joint interest. It is said that Charles Aitchison was a partner from the first, and continued to be so throughout the whole currency of the Queen Street business, with all the rights and liabilities of a partner in a trading concern. But it is said alternatively, that even if he was not a partner in any mercantile sense, the footing upon which the business was conducted from first to last was that the family should have a joint interest in its profits, whoever the nominal or legal partners were in a commercial and legal sense. There is a third, and to my mind a very formidable view, whether the members of this family, conducting their affairs upon a principle of mutual and tacit confidence in each other, did not leave them in a position so abnormal and primitive as, whatever the moral obligation might be, to create no legal standing ground for such a claim as this. I have seldom found more difficulty in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to my own mind than on the problems thus presented.

First, after full consideration I have come to a very clear opinion that the suggestion of a mercantile partnership on the part of the pursuer is one which cannot be maintained. The theory put forward by the pursuer on this head is, from the first there was an arrangement or understanding that each of the children should become partners in the family business when they became of age to accept and assume their share in it, and that although this was not evidenced by any writing at any time, the whole conduct of the parties, and the facts and circumstances under which they continued to act, are sufficient to establish that such was the case. I do not doubt that such a partnership might have been established by a general arrangement of this nature. Neither do I doubt that without any written document it might be proved by facts and circumstances leading inevitably to that inference. But the difficulty I find in giving effect to this plea is, that I can find no trace whatever of such an arrangement having been made, or any facts or circumstances leading to such an inference. On the contrary, I think it clear that no such arrangement was ever made, and that the facts and circumstances established by the proof are wholly inconsistent with it. If there were any arrangement and understanding which could receive any legal effect it was, I apprehend, of a nature entirely different.

The proposition to be proved is that Charles Aitchison became a partner of the trading firm of Jane Aitchison and Sons, and that he became, by contract entered into with him and some one entitled so to contract, liable for the debts as well as entitled to a share of the profits of the concern. Whoever made the contract originally, and however it may be established, that must be the legal result. Now, no one but his mother, old Mrs Aitchison, could have made this arrangement originally, and no one but the existing partners could have assumed him

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v
Aitchison.

afterwards. But it is quite certain that old Mrs Aitchison never made such arrangement. It is proved beyond all doubt that from first to last she kept, and intended to keep, the business in her own hand, and subject entirely to her own will, excepting as regarded the two recognised partners. She thought as regarded Charles that she had complete control over him, and actually, on his engagement to be married, excluded him from any share in her own or her husband's estate, which she believed and Charles believed included the business, and which Charles never doubted she had power to do. I should not have laid much stress on the conveyance of her share in the partnership to her sons James and John, excepting that it seems to have been read, without any circumstance or remark, at the meeting of the family after the mother's death. But that fact proves the knowledge of the whole circle that the imaginary arrangement never existed. But what to my mind is quite conclusive on this head is that Charles never imagined for a moment that he was a partner. During the whole period from 1837, when he became of age, to 1848, when his mother died, he never did an act or made a statement implying that he was a partner. He never drew on the firm's account. He never signed the company firm. He never in any way held himself out to the public as a partner, or, as far as I see, did any act which could have made him liable, or indicated any intention of making himself liable for the company's debts. I cannot regard the investments which were made from time to time as participation in the profits of the company, because these were manifestly not distributed on any such footing. But the most conclusive of the facts and circumstances in the case are the acts and statements of the pursuer himself, because from first to last, down to the date of his mother's death, he never thought that he was a partner or said he was, but said and thought the reverse.

The circumstances connected with his engagement to be married, and the action which was brought against him for breach of promise, throw a significant light on this part of the case. He was at that time twenty-nine years of age, and, if the plea I am now considering had been true, had been a partner for eight years. I am not disposed to say that the statements made by a counsel in a judicial pleading are necessarily the statements of the party for any purpose but that of the lawsuit itself. But the fact that the statements in the defence lodged for him to the action were made, and made, unquestionably, with his knowledge and sanction, is a fact of very considerable importance. He has indeed said that he may or may not have seen this paper, and that his brothers James and John managed it for him; but if he had never seen it he could hardly be ignorant of that fact. It is there stated on his behalf, not merely that he never was a partner of the firm of Aitchison and Sons, but that the lady who sued him had tried to entrap him on the mistaken idea that he was a partner. I cannot believe that any man could authorise such a statement knowing it to be false, and if his brothers John and James authorised it, it only shows more clearly that they knew it to be true. It is indeed suggested that these statements were made for a purpose, to prevent the lady from arresting funds in the hands of the copartnership. But truth as well as falsehood may be stated for a purpose, as I have no doubt these statements were. And lastly, on this head when Charles in the witness-box is confronted with these statements he cannot deny their truth. Being asked—"Did you instruct Mr Wotherspoon to say in your defences that you were not a partner of the business of Aitchison and Sons?" he says—"No; I was in the sense that by the two wills I expected to get it, but I never and nothing come. I always expected it to come to me, but I had never got it. No. 142.

 It was to come from the will of my mother, and I understood she had the power of excluding me." In other words, Charles knew that he was not a partner at that time, but only hoped he might become so. The mother executed two deeds for the purpose of excluding him from any share in the succession, and thus it seems to me clear that all the persons with whom this supposed contract was made, the mother, the two brothers, and Charles himself, knew quite well that no such contract had been made.

June 16, 1877.
 Aitchison v.
 Aitchison.

Some isolated facts were thrown in as make-weights to help this theory, but they have no bearing on the case. I do not detain your Lordships by reference to them. They were much later in date, and were of no materiality as proving partnership. But I have sketched the principal grounds on which I think that this part of the case must fail. There was no partnership in 1848 at the mother's death, and thereafter the imaginary contract never was made.

I pass on, however, to the second, and, in my mind, much more important feature of this case. The relation between the different members of the family was not, and never was supposed to be, one of mercantile partnership. It was rather one of domestic community. The whole family lived together, worked together, and had to a certain extent everything in common. They present a very remarkable and very pleasant picture of family concord and confidence, which was unbroken for nearly fifty years. They never thought of putting their interests in the legal light of a commercial partnership, but they evidently did consider the wonderful prosperity which had descended upon them as the fruit of a joint concern, and that concern the estate of their father out of which it had grown. Old Mrs Aitchison never ceased to think that she and her children were administering the father's estate, and that her power of division extended to the large increment which the business yielded, just as it would have done the £1300 which he left in 1823.

As regards the mother's impression, it is easy to see on what it rested. She had taken the capital of her husband's estate and had invested it for her children, and she considered herself bound to deal with its fruits as if it had been the estate of which she was the administratrix. There was some reason in that.
 The business had no other capital than what she furnished, and although that might not have been sufficient of itself to render these profits the property of the children, it very reasonably accounts for the light in which she regarded them. By her will she divided her husband's estate among her children equally, and in my opinion the whole of this case turns on what she and the children understood that their father's estate consisted of.

This brings me to refer to what appears to me to be the most important element in this singular history—I mean the minute of the meeting of the family the late Mrs Jane Aitchison, held on the 27th of November 1848.¹ This minute is signed by all the surviving children, and it contains an agreement to divide the estate of the mother and the estate of the father as if the cancellation of Charles' interest had never been made. Then this is followed by a minute of agreement in the year 1851, between Alexander Aitchison, the eldest son, on the one part, and John Aitchison, "on the part of his other brothers and sisters, and taking burden for them," on the other part.

The claim which Alexander had made, and which was adjusted by this minute,

¹ Quoted supra, p. 902.

No. 142. was made on precisely the same grounds as that of the pursuer. He wanted a division of the partnership property as one of the family entitled to participate in his father's estate. The minute of agreement makes over certain heritable subjects to Alexander, which it is said are to be henceforth the property of Alexander Aitchison, and his brothers and his sister are at their expense to concur in making them over to him, and he is to be infest therein at their expense. On the other hand, it is stipulated that the remainder of the property of the late John Aitchison, or of his widow and family, including the subjects in Broughton Street, is to be henceforth the property of the other members of the family, and they are at their own expense to receive from Alexander Aitchison all deeds which may be necessary for fully vesting them therein. Then follows an obligation of a mutual discharge between Alexander and the rest of the family.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

Now, that which Alexander Aitchison had claimed, and which he thereby discharged, was a claim on the company's stock. It appears clearly from the evidence that that was the substance of his contention with the family. He wanted the company wound up and the estate divided, from which it appears quite clearly that the property of the widow and family, which was henceforth to be the property of the other members of the family, and the claims against which were to be discharged, were truly the profits of the business. It cannot be concealed that even in these writings there is a certain amount of ambiguity involved, but their importance consists in this, that if, as I am inclined to hold, the other circumstances of the case indicate throughout a community of interest from first to last, then this last-mentioned document, read in the light of these circumstances, amounts to a written acknowledgment of that common interest under the hand of John Aitchison as acting for all the members of the family. I cannot believe that the restitution of Charles under the first minute or the discharge by Alexander under the second, only referred to the two sums of £1300 which had been left by their father and mother. If I am right in this view of the transaction it relieves the case of all technical difficulty as regards the proof of trust, and amounts to an acknowledgment in writing of, what all the evidence seems to me to indicate, a common interest in the whole family in the realised fortune.

The Lord Ordinary has so fully explained the import of the general evidence on this subject that I forbear to enlarge on it. If I am right in my reading of these writings, the case rests, as I think, on a sufficiently solid foundation, and one much more consistent with the proved facts of the case than the theory of a commercial partnership in law. If a family of brothers and sisters, each engaged in their own avocations, agree to live together, and throw their separate earnings into a common fund, they will not thereby become partners in the separate trades or callings in which each might be engaged; but still, if they choose, by writing under their hand, to indicate the nature of their arrangement, the joint purse might be equally divisible. Such, I think, is the case here; nor do I think that the technical rule of law in regard to the proof of trust will avail to prevent us from giving effect to what we think was the true intention of the parties.

If, however, I am wrong in my view of these writings, it may be that, with the most friendly and affectionate intentions towards each other, the members of this family have failed to put their intentions in a form which the law will enforce. It is impossible to disguise that this alternative is capable of being supported by considerations not without weight. But with the best attention I have been able to give to a case which has perplexed me more than any I ever had occasion to consider, I am of opinion, on the grounds which I have shortly illustrated, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to. No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v. Aitchison.

LORD ORMDALE.—This is a very important case, not only as regards the large pecuniary interests involved, but also the nicety and difficulty in some respects of the legal principles upon which it depends.

The original defender, John Aitchison, having died since the Lord Ordinary's judgment was pronounced, his sister has been sisted in his place as his executrix and representative. It will be understood, however, that when I refer to the defender I mean the late John Aitchison. In dealing with the case I think it will be found of much importance, and conduce greatly to a sound result, to begin by endeavouring to ascertain what is the nature of the contract or other ground upon which the liability of the defender to the pursuer rests, for that there is some measure and description of liability is not disputed. Is it the contract of service as maintained by the defender, or the contract of partnership maintained by the pursuer, or does the liability of the defender to account arise simply from the position of trustee which, in one view of the case, it may be supposed he occupied in relation to the pursuer during the greater part of his life?

That the pursuer was merely a servant in the Queen Street establishment of Aitchison and Sons from the time he went there in 1835 till the raising of this action in 1875, a period of forty years, and that he can have no claim upon the defender on any other footing, is, I think, a wholly inadmissible view of the case. And yet, according to the defender's statement in the record, and when examined as a witness in the case, not only was the pursuer's position in the Queen Street business that of a mere servant, but his services as such were so valued as not to be "equivalent to the cost of his maintenance." This is in minis the statement he makes in the third article of his statement of facts; accordingly he admits in the course of his evidence that he never paid him any of his brothers any salary; and afterwards he says—"There was never any arrangement with Charles as to what wages he should get. He came and money from me occasionally." This evidence is wholly unsupported by entries in the books of the concern—books admittedly kept by or under the charge of the defender himself—and in opposition to all the other evidence in the case, which, whether sufficient or not to establish the ground action maintained by the pursuer, is at any rate conclusive to the effect that the pursuer's position in the business was not that of a servant merely. In the record, then, to that view of the matter, I consider it quite unnecessary to say anything, except to remark that the circumstance of the defender having put it forward, and in connection with it attempted to disparage without sufficient cause, the position and capacity of the pursuer, is calculated to detract very much from his credibility in other respects.

Then, the defender's view of his own and the pursuer's position in the business in question, viz., that of master and servant, and an accounting on that footing, may be dismissed as altogether untenable, the only other grounds of liability and accounting as between the pursuer and defender which I think were established were those of trust and partnership—that is to say, either that the defender must be held to have stood in the relation of a trustee to the pursuer, or that he and the pursuer, with other members of the family, had carried on the

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

business in question in partnership, and that the defender having taken possession of the partnership funds and property in whole or in part is bound to account to the pursuer for his share thereof.

Now, in regard to holding that the defender's position was merely that of a trustee, and that he is subject to liability to account in that character alone, I have been unable to satisfy myself that this is the true ground of action, or that it can be sustained in the circumstances. It is certainly not the ground upon which the pursuer's counsel maintained his case at the bar. On the contrary, they distinctly stated, in answer to the direct inquiry of the Court, that it was partnership upon which they relied; and for myself I do not see how they could well have given any other answer, having regard not only to the whole circumstances of the case, but especially to the passage in the evidence of the pursuer when examined as a witness, in these terms—" (Q.) What have you understood all along to be your position in this business?—(A.) Just a partner. (Q.) Equally with the rest?—(A.) Yes; equally. (Q.) With all your brothers and your sister—(A.) All the same. (Q.) Can you say from anything which was stated to you by George and William what they understood to be their position?—(A.) Just the same." It would be difficult therefore, I think, for the pursuer, in the face of such evidence as this, given by himself, to maintain his action on any other ground than that of partnership. Besides, it is very obvious that if it was purely trust and not partnership that the pursuer desired to make out, a great part of the proof must be held to be incompetent; for it is a rule of the law in Scotland, about which there can be no question, that a trust can only be established against a party by his writ or oath, as required by the Act 1696, cap. 2. But in this case the proof has not been governed by any such rule. On the contrary, a great deal of parole testimony has been adduced quite inconsistent with it, although very valuable in the constitution of a partnership. I do not, indeed, see how the indispensable foundation of a trust can be found in this case. There is no doubt the family agreement embodied in the minute No 20 of proceedings dated 27th November 1848,¹ which, being subscribed by both the pursuer and defender, must be held to be the writ of each. But after careful consideration of that writ I have been unable to hold that it can be taken as constituting trust—such a trust as would be necessary to support the present action against the defender. It bears as its sole object to set aside a codicil to her will by Mrs Aitchison, and to declare that the estate of her husband, the father of one of the parties to the minute, should be divided as if no such codicil existed. Beyond this there is nothing in the minute, and it certainly contains no express reference to a trust or to trustees. And if parole evidence were admissible at all in a question as to the constitution of a trust, in order to explain the true meaning of the minute of 27th November 1848, I do not see how the parole evidence in the present case can aid that object. No witness is asked anything, I think, in relation to the minute except the pursuer and defender. The first is not, however, asked a single question as to what he understood to be the meaning and effect of the minute. He is merely asked some questions as to the bearing on another minute of agreement between old Mrs Aitchison and her sons John and James, in which they describe themselves as the "only partners in the company carrying on business in No 77 Queen Street, Edinburgh."² How far that agreement may be a piece of evidence in the question whether the p suer was or was not a partner in the Queen Street business will be afterwards considered with the rest of the evidence bearing on that matter, but as to its establishing a trust, or being any evidence to that effect, I fail to understand. As to the defender's parole testimony, again, he is merely asked in regard to the minute of agreement No. 7 of process, about his mother's signature to it, and as to its meaning or effect; and so, as to the minute of 27th November 1848, No. 20 of process, he is merely asked a few questions to shew that all the family were present at the meeting, and that the minute sets out what really occurred.

¹ Quoted supra, p. 902.

² Quoted supra, p. 901.

No. 142.
June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

In my opinion, therefore, the ground of the defender's liability to account to the pursuer must, if it is to be established at all, be made out on the footing of there having been a partnership between them and their brothers and sisters. There can be no doubt, I think, that such a ground of action has been averred and pleaded by the pursuer with sufficient relevancy and specification, and this did not understand to be disputed.

It only remains, then, in any admissible view that I can take of the case, to consider whether the pursuer has established his claim against the defender for accounting on the ground of partnership. But, before examining the evidence applicable to such a ground of liability it is necessary to keep in view the mode by which partnership may be legally constituted, and the nature of the evidence by which it may be competently established. Professor Bell—and no higher authority than that could be appealed to on the subject—says, section 351 of his Principles,—“Partnership may be described as a mutual contract and voluntary association of two or more persons for the acquisition of gain or profit, with a contribution, for that end, of stipulated charges of goods, money, skill, and industry—the stock of the society being held in trust for creditors.” And in section 353 he explains,—“The stock of the company, as contributed, and increased diminished by the dealings of the company, is not only common and held pro diviso by all the partners, but it is vested in them in trust, for the creditors of the company in the first place; and afterwards for division among the partners, according to the shares of each.” I do not suppose that exception can be taken to this definition of partnership, and I think it was incumbent upon the pursuer to make out that there was a partnership, as so defined, between him and the defender and the other members of their family.

But in order to do this it was not necessary for the pursuer to shew that there was any written contract of copartnership specifically setting out the kind of business which was to form its object, the date of its commencement, the number of partners, the capital or stock contributed by each, or any other particulars. As this Professor Bell says, in section 361 of his Principles, in reference to the evidence of partnership as between the partners themselves—and that is the question which presents itself for consideration in the present case—that “partnership as between the partners themselves is a consensual contract, and on such evidence as the law of Scotland admits in proof of consent the partners will be entitled to their rights as such, or bound to the public. This may be either, 1st, a solemn written contract of copartnership duly authenticated; 2d, a less formal writing,—letters exchanged, minutes, articles subscribed by initials and afterwards acted upon, or articles written in the ledger; 3d, circumstantial proof; or 4th, parole evidence of clerks, agents, or persons dealing with the company.” That the law of England is to the same effect is obvious from the statement in Mr Justice Aldley's work on Partnership (vol. 1 of last ed. p. 94), where he says—“Partnerships, even for long terms of years, very often exist in this country

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

without any written agreement at all, the absence of direct documentary evidence of any agreement for a partnership is entitled to very little weight. As between the alleged partners themselves, the evidence relied on where no written agreement is forthcoming, is their conduct, the mode in which they have dealt with each other, and the mode in which each has, with the knowledge of the other dealt with other people. This can be shewn by books of account, by the testimony of clerks, agents, and other persons, by letters and admissions, and, in short, by any of the modes in which facts can be established."

When the true nature of partnership is considered, and the various modes in which it may be established as a consensual contract, as now explained, are kept in view, much of the difficulty which might otherwise be experienced in arriving at a determination in this case will, I think, disappear. It must also be recollected that the alleged partnership, if it existed at all, continued over a very long period of time; that the acts and conduct of the parties, as well as the other circumstances occurring during all that time, must be considered as a whole, and not taken and disposed of in reference to separate and detached periods, or separate and detached events.

The only question, then, that remains is the jury one, for it is essentially a jury question, although tried by the Court as in place of a jury—Whether the pursuer has sufficiently established that the alleged partnership existed? As this leads me to a consideration of the evidence in the case. It is not, however, my intention to enter with much detail or minuteness into an examination of the evidence; nor is it necessary that I should do so after the thorough manner in which this has been done by the Lord Ordinary. There are, however, some points arising on the proof in regard to which it may be right that I should say a few words.

There is, first, the peculiar state of matters for the time between the death of old Mr Aitchison, the father of the parties, in 1823, and the death of the wife of their mother, in 1848. If the question of partnership had arisen in reference to that period and been limited to that period of time alone, the pursuer might have had more difficulty to encounter than he has in the case as it stands, for undoubtedly the relative position of parties was peculiar, and in certain views scarcely consistent with partnership. But when the acts and conduct of the parties, and all the circumstances which subsequently occurred, are also taken into consideration in connection with and in continuation of these of the more limited period I have referred to, a flood of reflected light is let in which enables the Court to determine what the true position of the parties has been throughout, and what their respective rights and liabilities. For example, as the pursuer was in partnership for some part of the limited period between the deaths of his father and mother, he could neither have discharged the duties nor subjected himself to the responsibilities of a partner.

But it is also indisputable that his mother and brothers, including the defender who had attained majority long before him, might, if they pleased, have assisted towards him, and so dealt with his patrimony, as to entitle him after he came of age to assume the position of a partner, and warrant him in insisting, as he now does, for an accounting with the defender. This very point is dealt with by Professor Bell in his Commentaries (vol. ii. p. 624 of 5th ed.), where he says "One who is incapable of consent—a pupil, an idiot, or a lunatic—cannot enter into a partnership; but they may continue to enjoy the benefit of a share in a partnership which has pre-existed or has descended to them." Mr Lindsay again (vol. i. p. 82), says—"An infant may be a partner; but, speaking generally, while he is an infant he incurs no liability, and is not responsible for the debts of the firm; and when he comes of age, or even before it, he may, if he chooses, disaffirm past transactions." But as Mr Justice Lindley also shews (ib. p. 84), the infant may after he comes of age affirm and ratify what has been done for him, and continue the partnership which had previously commenced. I cannot, therefore, see that any insuperable difficulty arises from the age of the pursuer during some part of the time between the deaths of his father and mother, or from the apparent assumption, on one occasion at least, by his mother of power to disinherit him, and cut him off from all connection with the alleged partnership business. The conduct of the pursuer's mother in this respect appears, as has been satisfactorily explained by the Lord Ordinary, to have been imputed for a temporary purpose, and was very soon departed from.

Nor do I think that the written documents, very few in number, founded on by the defender as proving that he and his brother James were the only partners of Aitchison and Sons, create any great difficulty, when all the circumstances connected with them are kept in view. The pursuer was not a party to any of these documents, and it is not proved that he had ever seen any of them till they were produced in the present action, except the minute of agreement of 23d December 1847, No. 7 of process,¹ to which I have had occasion already to allude. But the pursuer was not a party to that minute of agreement, and of course he was not in any way committed or bound by it, at least directly. It was argued, however, that as it was referred to in the minute of meeting of 27th November 1848, No. 20 of process,² and as the pursuer was present at that meeting and took no objection to the statement in it, to the effect that the defender and James Aitchison were the only partners of the company carrying on business in Queen Street, he must be held to have admitted that as a fact, and is now barred from maintaining the contrary. I cannot think so, having regard to the pursuer's explanations when examined as a witness, and the mass of evidence in the case inconsistent with and contradictory of any such theory.

Another piece of written evidence on which the defender seemed greatly to rely, but with which, I must own, I have not been much impressed, is the statement made in name of the pursuer in his defences to Miss Tucker's action against him, to the effect that he was not a partner of the Queen Street company. But, besides the reasons assigned by the Lord Ordinary for laying that statement aside of little moment, I must remark that I greatly doubt whether it is admissible competent evidence at all in the present suit. It was a statement made in a different suit with a different party and in reference to a different matter altogether; and it has not, I think, been sufficiently proved that the pleading in which the statement appears had been seen by or approved of by the pursuer, though made for him by his solicitor or counsel. In the case of Marianski v. Cairns it appears to have been held in the House of Lords (1 Macqueen, p. 212) that, as a general rule, pleadings for a party in one suit cannot be used in another way of admission against him unless the pleadings were signed by himself. Now, as the pleadings for the pursuer in the suit with Tucker were not signed by him, the statements contained in these pleadings cannot legitimately be used founded on against him in the present case.

But while there are some written documents of more or less importance which the defender has founded on as furnishing evidence in his favour, there are other

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
*Aitchison.*¹ Quoted supra, p. 901.² Quoted supra, p. 902.

No. 142.
—
June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

writings which appear to me to furnish evidence equally strong, if not stronger, against him. Take, for example, the minute of agreement of 17th March 1851, No. 9 of process, between the defender and his eldest brother Alexander Aitchison, when the latter went out of the business and separated his interests from the rest of the family. John, the defender, entered into that agreement, as it bears, for himself, and "on the part of his other brothers (including the present pursuer) and sister." By the second head of that agreement it is stipulated that, with the exception of what is specially assigned to Alexander, "the remainder of the property of the late John Aitchison, or of his widow and family, including the subjects in Broughton Street, is to be henceforth the property of the other members of the family." It rather appears to me that the defender was here dealing with the whole property and interests which had accrued to him and all the family from both father and mother, and if so, the whole property and interests—and the company business of Aitchison and Sons was and is a very valuable property—which he maintains in the present action to have then belonged to him after settling with Alexander, must have comprehended the very partnership, property, and interests now in dispute. And if I am right in this, it is all but conclusive against the defender, especially when taken in connection with what appears to be the relative explanatory statement of Alexander Aitchison, in his own handwriting, No. 173 of process,¹ and the formal disposition, No. 144 of process, which was shortly afterwards executed by Alexander, of the Queen Street shop, where the business was carried in favour, not of the defender only, but of him and also of the pursuer and all the brothers and sisters then alive.

Independently of and in addition to the written documents there is a great deal of what appears to me to be very valuable oral testimony, which, indeed, was indispensable in explanation of the acts and conduct of parties. Now, I cannot help thinking that the preponderance of the parole testimony is favourable to the pursuer and against the defender. After very careful consideration I think it establishes amongst others the following important points—(1) That there was throughout a common purse or fund into which, on the one hand, all the drawings from the Queen Street business and its branches, and the rents of the houses, and interest of the other investments made by them from time to time, were put, and, on the other hand, all the personal expenses of the parties were drawn as they required; (2) that it is also established that the pursuer, from the time he joined the business in 1835 till the present action was raised, was as constantly in attendance and charge of his own department of the business as the defender was of his; (3) that it is also established that in or for such attendance and charge there is no indication whatever of the pursuer having ever acted, or been paid or treated as a servant or employee merely in the business any more than the defender himself; (4) that it has, on the contrary, been proved by distinct and uncontradicted testimony that the pursuer acted, and was looked upon and considered by others, as a partner of the company just as the defender was; and (5) that no rent was ever paid by the company or by the defender and James, assuming that they were the only partners of it, as the defender says, for the Queen Street premises, although according to the title, and indeed admittedly, these premises belonged to all the family alike, and not to the defender and James or either of them alone.

¹ A writing headed "Statement of Facts for Mr Alexander Aitchison, 1849" embodying Alexander's views in regard to the questions in dispute between him and his brothers.

It only remains for me to notice the Wemyss Place baking business, and to say that although this part of the case appears to be attended with some difficulty, it is not attached to the Queen Street business proper, yet, for the reasons stated by the Lord Ordinary, I think it must be held to have been very much of the nature of an adjunct to or branch of the Queen Street business. This is, I think, the only view of the matter that can fairly be taken in a question with the defender. On the grounds, therefore, which I have now explained, and for the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against ought to be adhered to.

No. 142.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

LORD GIFFORD.—This is in some respects a difficult and perplexing case, but I have felt its difficulty to be rather in the application of legal principle to a case so singular, and perhaps unprecedented, than in any doubt as to the fair import and meaning of the evidence which has been adduced.

The legal rights of the parties, the rights of the pursuer and of the original defender, who is now represented by the sole surviving sister, are to be determined on a consideration of their whole actings and conduct, and of the actings and conduct of the other members of the family during the whole period of their respective lives, at least from the year 1823, when old John Aitchison, baker in Edinburgh, the father of the whole family, died, down to 1875, when the present dispute arose. The family history thus extends over a period of upwards of fifty years. During that period the whole actings and conduct of the pursuer and defender, and indeed of all the members of the family, must be fully considered, for it is upon a just estimate of the legal effect of these actings and of that conduct that the rights of the individual members of this family must be determined.

The history of this family is almost unique. Perhaps in earlier and simpler times, when manners were more patriarchal, the occurrence of such a history might be more frequent. In modern times, at least, and with modern manners, its occurrence is and must be very rare.

Old John Aitchison died in 1823, leaving a widow and a family of nine. None of the children excepting Alexander were ever married. The widow and the whole family, excepting Alexander, who was married in 1834, always occupied the same dwelling-house. They lived as one family under the same roof. From time to time each of them, as they attained, I may almost say, puberty or early youth, contributed their services and efforts for behoof of the common and divided family. At first the widow and the elder children took up and carried on the baking business which the father had left at his death in 1823. From time to time, as the other members of the family came in, they extended the business, took additional shops in different localities, improving and extending the business by adding to it a large and what ultimately became its most important branch, that of confectionery, skilled cooking, and the preparation of ices and desserts. In the conduct of this business in its various branches, and at the different shops, each member of the family devoted himself or herself to the department or work for which each was best suited. The original defender John, who had received a mercantile education, became book-keeper and cashier. The pursuer ultimately became the practical confectioner, and seems to have had very high skill in the preparation of the delicacies of the table. Her brothers superintended the bread and biscuit baking, or bought and dealt in wheat and flour, while the daughters, or such of them as were not needed to

No. 142.
June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

superintend the domestic arrangements of the common dwelling-house, served in the shops and attended to the customers at the counters. There never was any written contract of copartnery, or any written deed of agreement of any kind—the family had so much confidence in each other that they never thought of defining their rights in or reducing their agreement to writing. Their cordiality was so great, their confidence in each other so exuberant, that they never seem to have thought of asking even in their own minds what their rights were. They were brothers and sisters, and that was enough, and as morning and evening they met round the common table, or as they separated daily each to his appropriate work, but all contributing to one common end, and as they rejoined at evening—one unbroken circle—no question of legal right seems ever to have shadowed their primeval life, for no one ever called anything that he had his own.

From the first this united family had to all intents and purposes a common purse. The old father, John Aitchison, who died in 1823, had left, beside some heritable property, a sum of about £1300. The widow—the mother—seems to have taken possession of her husband's estate, and the whole went into the common stock, and was applied in carrying on the common business. None of the children ever dreamed of asking a division of patrimony either before or after the widow's death, which occurred in 1848, nor did any of them ever ask or obtain any count and reckoning with each other either in reference to their father's succession or their mother's succession, or in reference to the money made in the different shops and businesses which from time to time they carried on. The only exception is the case of the eldest son Alexander, who having married in 1834 (and he was the only married member of the family) came to have interests which were or at least might be separate from, if not adverse to, those of his brothers and sisters. Alexander, from his marriage in 1834, seems to have managed as his own a separate business, but he still retained, at least he claimed to have retained, his share and interest in what may be termed the family or community stock and estate held in common by all the other members of the family, and this claim was not finally settled and Alexander Aitchison finally paid out till 17th March 1851. Of that date a minute of agreement was entered into, No. 9 of process, between Alexander Aitchison on the one part, for himself, and John Aitchison, on the other part, acting not for himself only, but for all the other members of the family. By that agreement Alexander Aitchison agreed to take, and did take, in full of all his claims certain heritable subjects specially agreed upon, and a share in the Stockdale Mill Company, and in respect thereof he discharged his brothers and sisters of all further claim; and, on the other hand (and this is very material, for the deed is the deed of the late John Aitchison, the original defender, acting for himself and for all his brothers and sisters except Alexander), it is expressly stipulated that the remainder of the property—first, of the late John Aitchison, that of the common father; second, of his widow, that is, old Mrs Aitchison, who died three years before; and third, of the family, that is, the whole estate, most of them then getting to be elderly persons—I take the words of the deed—“is to be henceforth the property of the other members of the family, and they are at their own expense to receive from Alexander Aitchison all such which may be necessary for fully vesting them therein.” In this way every article or item of property belonging to the family, except what was specially handed over to Alexander in 1851, is declared to be and plainly was the property erty—that is, the common property—of the other members of the family—that No. 142.

of the whole children excepting Alexander.

It appears to me that this incident in the family history—I mean the final June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.
paying out or paying off the eldest son Alexander in 1851—throws great light upon the footing on which the rest stood at that date. Exceptio firmat regulam. Alexander is no longer to be a member of this family community, but all the rest are to continue to be so. The discharge of Alexander and the deed executed between him and John really amounts to an express declaration that everything that is left is in point of fact the joint and pro indiviso property of John and his whole remaining brothers and sister. The perfect community and equality of the interests of the remaining brothers and sister are thus made all the clearer by the exceptional exclusion of one brother, Alexander.

This conclusion—I mean the conclusion that all the property of the brothers and sister except Alexander was held in common—is confirmed, if confirmation is necessary, by the mutual wills which a couple of months afterwards all the elder brothers and the sister made in favour of each other. These wills are of the 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of process, and thereby each member of the family constituted all the others—excepting always Alexander—to be in equal shares their respective universal heirs, and thus the family all living in the common domicile in Queen Street were united both in life and in case of death as a community, each having equal shares in one undivided common fund. Practically this family had only one bank account, for although individual members seem on one or two occasions to have set apart sometimes in bank what may be called his or her peculium or pocket-money, there was really only one common bank account for their common earnings. Into this account went the profits which arose from the various businesses and transactions in which the family were engaged. Out of it came from time to time the sums required for the investments which were made from time to time chiefly in the purchase of heritable subjects, in loans, and in shares in public companies. The bank account was in name of “Jane Aitchison and Sons,” Jane Aitchison being the widow’s name, and it was operated upon by James Aitchison, by John Aitchison, by George Aitchison, and by Isabella Aitchison, all of whom had power to sign cheques and draw whatever sums were required for common purposes. The fact that the others of the family, and in particular the pursuer, did not draw and had no right to draw on the bank account is immaterial, for it often happens even in the most mercantile partnerships that only some of the partners are allowed to draw on the bank account.

The mode in which and the persons in whose favour the various investments were taken occasion some difficulty, but I think, on the whole, the history of the investments points to continued community of interest. Large sums seem to have been saved almost every year, for the businesses were all prosperous, and these sums were invested from time to time as the balance accumulated in the bank. At first the investments were taken in the names of all the children, including Alexander before he was paid out, but afterwards they were taken, so far as I can judge, almost arbitrarily, sometimes in name of one member of the family, sometimes of another, and sometimes of several different members of the family, the names being selected arbitrarily or at least without any apparent principle. It is not possible to state any principle upon which the various investments are allocated among the different members of the family. It is not pretended that there was any attempt at equality, and it is certain that there never

No. 142. was in any one single case any assignment of special value given, such as wages for service rendered, or salary or remuneration for work done by any particular member of the family.

June 16, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

And then, after the investments were made, what followed points still more strongly to the continuing community in the whole and in each of the investments, for the rents, dividends, and interests accruing on the investments were not uplifted, drawn, and retained by those particular members of the family in whose names the investments were made, but they all came back to the common stock, helped to swell the annual surplus of each year, which again went to the purchase of new investments made in the same way, and the profits of which accruing from time to time were deposited and accumulated as before.

The adoption of special names for the investments seems to have arisen from the advice which the family had received that the titles to heritable subjects could not be taken to a company or community, but must be taken in the names of specified individuals. In the fullness of the confidence which subsisted between those brothers and sister it seems to have been thought of no consequence whatever in whose names any of the investments were taken.

I gather, then, from the evidence regarding the investments additional corroboration of what appears in the whole history, besides, that the whole property of this family, excepting Alexander after 1851, was the common property of all and of every member thereof.

I need not go further into the details of the evidence which has been laid before us. These details all point one way. Even the seeming exceptions when carefully examined really make for the same result. For example, when George Aitchison, instead of carrying the daily drawings of the Wemyss Place shop to his brother John in Queen Street, as he used to do, to be banked in common form in the common bank account, began to accumulate these drawings in tin boxes in his back shop till they amounted to a great many thousands of pounds, he did so not because he thought or held that these drawings were his own, but as a means of inducing his brother John, who was common cashier, to tell him the state of the common affairs, which he thought John was concealing or withholding, and with whom George did not want to come to open rupture, and accordingly these very tin-box accumulations, and the bank account, when after the attempted burglary superseded the tin boxes, were not kept by George to himself, but were applied, just like the ordinary investments of surplus profits between himself and his brothers William and Charles. From first to last not a shilling was ever paid in wages to any one member of the family, although they all contributed their work and labour and skill; and yet, except upon the footing of community and common interest, the defender's theory must be that some of the brothers and sister were merely the servants or employees of the others, though who were masters and who were servants it is impossible to say. When the country residence of Mount Vernon was purchased in 1854, the title to it was taken to all the brothers and sisters then surviving except Alexander, and its fruit and produce—grapes, peaches, and strawberries, very large quantities in amount—all came to the common Queen Street business. The very attempt to exclude the present pursuer, or to attempt or pretend to exclude him, when in 1845 he got into a scrape by promising to marry Miss Tucker, and was cleared in damages, really confirms his equal interest in the whole, for when Miss Tucker's diligence was got rid of, and she had been induced to accept a compromise, um in full of her claims, the pretended exclusion was done away with, and the No. 142.

 pursuer was recognised as an equal member of this fraternal community.

Without going further into the evidence, the result is that I have ultimately June 16, 1877.
 Aitchison v.
 Aitchison.
 come, and really without much difficulty, to the conclusion that all the members of this family, including old Mrs Aitchison while she survived, agreed that their whole property should be held in common as one individual family ; that the business which they carried on at first in one, and afterwards in several shops and departments, should belong to them all, and be carried on for their common benefit and behoof ; that the whole profits and produce, both of the property and of the business, should form one common fund, in which all the members of the family should share in equal proportions. It is also proved that when Alexander Aitchison left this community in 1851 the whole other members of the family agreed to continue joint proprietors in equal shares of the businesses and properties which remained after Alexander was paid out. I have no difficulty coming to this conclusion in point of fact. The conduct and actings of the parties admit, I think, of no other interpretation, and the equitable claim of each member of the family to one just and equal share of the whole accumulated stock and property, is, I think, clearly established.

It only remains to consider whether the law can give effect to an agreement of family community, as I may call it, established by facts and circumstances, I think has been done in the present case, and if so, what is the legal character of the legal position of the parties to such an agreement, and what is the legal category under which such agreement falls.

Now, I am of opinion that it is quite legal and competent for the members of a family, or indeed for any person whatever, whether related by blood or not, to enter into such an agreement as that made between the members of this Aitchison family, and I think such agreement (I have called it provisionally an agreement of community) may be legally and competently proved, as has been done in the present case, by facts and circumstances.

But I think the compact between the members of this family is really a case of partnership, and falls under that category of the law. No doubt it is much wider and broader than mercantile partnerships usually are. It embraced the whole property of all the partners, at least all the property to which they had title by succession from their father and mother, with all its increments, and all which each of them had earned or contributed to earn from their early youth upwards. This may be a very uncommon kind of partnership, but there is nothing illegal in it, and all the incidents of partnership are equally applicable to it as to the ordinary case where each partner only contributes a specified portion of special capital upon which the trade is to be carried on. Indeed, community is just a name for a wide and universal partnership, which includes the whole estate and the whole property and earnings of all the socii.

Again, it may be difficult or impossible to say at what precise date each member of this family partnership acquired the rights or incurred the liabilities of a partner, but this may often happen even in strict mercantile partnerships, when they are constituted not by formal agreement but by long actings of the partners de facto. When once sufficient proof by actings and circumstances has accumulated, the law may affirm the partnership, though it may not be possible to fix a precise date of its commencement. It is quite established law that a pupil or lunatic who is adopted as a partner, and whose funds are employed in a partnership business, will be held as a partner to the effect of sharing in the

No. 142. whole profits, although from his inability to consent he will not be liable as a partner to third parties, and will not be answerable if the concern proves unsuccessful and results in loss.

June 18, 1877.
Aitchison v.
Aitchison.

It may also be quite true that if any question had arisen with third parties such third parties might have been quite unable to establish this partnership so as to bring home personal liability to the pursuer or to his sister or to some others of the less prominent members of the family. But this would be simply from the difficulty of the proof as undertaken by third parties in the case supposed. It would be an accident, not of the contract, but of the difficulty of proving it, and this often happens even in strict mercantile partnerships. There are often sleeping partners who lie so quiet and are so concealed that the public creditors of the firm cannot discover them so as to bring home liability to them, and yet in questions inter socios their rights as partners may be made perfectly clear.

In short, I am prepared to hold, although at first I had great difficulty in doing so, that the present is a proper case of universal partnership between all the members of the Aitchison family, Alexander of course being excepted after 1851—that the stock of the partnership consisted of the whole patrimony or succession of all the members of the family, with the whole increment and accumulations which resulted either from the employment of that patrimony in the various businesses in which the members of the family engaged or from the investments in the acquisition of which from time to time parts of the common stock were expended.

But after all I am not sure whether there is any necessity for defining with logical accuracy the precise legal category under which the present case falls. The Lord Ordinary has not done so, and, I think, it will be sufficient if we refer here to the interlocutor which he has pronounced.

THE COURT adhered.

LOCKHEART THOMSON, S.S.C.—WOTHERSPOON & MACK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 143.

ALEXANDER GEORGE GOW, Petitioner.—Fraser—R. V. Campbell.

CHARLES WILLIAM SCHULZE, Respondent.—Balfour—Lang.

June 19, 1877.
Gow v.
Schulze.

Partnership—Dissolution and Winding up—Sequestration of Partnership Estate, and Appointment of Judicial Factor.—Where, after the dissolution of a partnership, the two partners differed in the winding up of the concern, and the realisation of its outstanding accounts, the Court refused a petition by one of the partners for the sequestration of the partnership estate and appointment of a judicial factor, on the ground that the questions between the partners really resolved into questions of accounting, which a judicial factor could not determine, and that in the realisation of outstanding debts the appointment of a judicial factor would be without advantage, and the cause of additional expense to the partnership estate.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
B.

THIS was a petition presented to the Court by Alexander George Gow, merchant in Dundee, one of the partners of the dissolved firm of Schulze, Gow, and Co., for sequestration of the partnership estate, and appointment of a judicial factor to realise the estate and wind up the concern.

In support of this petition Mr Gow stated: In 1866 a contract of copartnership had been entered into by himself and Mr Charles William Schulze to carry on business under the firm of Schulze, Gow, and Co. as merchants and commission-agents. This partnership subsisted until 1866

July 1875, when, by mutual consent of the partners, it was brought to an end, and the company thereafter only existed for the purpose of liquidation. The business of the firm was entirely in Dundee and Galashiels goods, and the customers of the firm were chiefly, if not entirely, foreigners carrying on business in all parts of the Continent and in Egypt. The Dundee business was managed solely by the petitioner himself, and the Galashiels branch by Mr Schulze. According to the arrangement between the partners a complete set of books was to be kept at Galashiels for the firm's Galashiels business, and another complete set of books at Dundee, to embrace the firm's whole business, including the Galashiels business. One bank account was kept in the Bank of Scotland, Dundee, for the whole business of the firm, and funds were thence supplied for the business of the Galashiels branch. Mr Schulze drew upon this account, and ought to have lodged his receipts therein, but failed to do so to a large amount. He likewise failed to keep regular books at Galashiels for the firm's business there, and failed to supply the petitioner with information as to the firm's transactions there for the making up of the general books of the firm. The business of the firm had been very profitable during the years 1873-75, and at the dissolution of the firm on 31st July 1875 the company estate was of the value of at least £25,000, consisting of—goods of the Dundee branch, about £4400; goods of the Galashiels branch, about £6841; outstanding accounts due to the Galashiels branch, about £5000; a large unascertained amount due by agents of the firm to the Galashiels branch; and a large unascertained amount of profits on the Galashiels business not accounted for. Owing to Mr Schulze's default the petitioner was unable to give an accurate or detailed state of the company's affairs. The liabilities of the firm at Dundee had been discharged, and it was represented by Mr Schulze that the liabilities of the firm at Galashiels had also been discharged, but whether or not this was so the petitioner was unable to ascertain. When the winding up of the firm's affairs commenced the petitioner pressed on Mr Schulze the necessity of at once taking stock, and making up a balance-sheet of the firm's affairs. This Mr Schulze delayed and evaded, and had continued to evade, so that the petitioner was still without information as to how the affairs of the firm stood. So far as the making up of the accounts of the firm Mr Schulze would give no assistance, and refused to concur with the petitioner in taking any proper steps for winding up the affairs of the firm, and a joint liquidation by the partners had become impracticable. Further, in the realisation of the assets of the firm Mr Schulze had used his powers as a partner and his position as head of the Galashiels branch, to the injury of the petitioner and the destruction of mutual confidence and co-operation. He was intent upon establishing himself exclusively in the business formerly carried on by the firm in Galashiels; in league with the foreign agents and travellers of the firm whom he was employing he was using his opportunities to further his own ends at the expense of the petitioner. Though nearly two years had elapsed since the dissolution of the copartnership he had never given any satisfactory account of the Galashiels stock or of its disposal, and he had or pretended he had collected none of the debts due to the Galashiels branch, which amounted to more than £5000. These outstanding accounts of the firm were in imminent danger of being lost if a judicial factor was not at once appointed.

Mr Schulze resisted the application for the appointment of a factor, on the ground that the appointment would be a great expense to the firm, and of little practical use. He denied the averments of the petitioner, and represented that all obstruction in winding up the busi-

No. 143.

June 19, 1877.
Gow v.
Schulze.

No. 143.

June 19, 1877.
Gow v.
Schulze.

ness had been occasioned by the petitioner, and that the debts due to the Galashiels branch, which it was proposed the judicial factor should collect, were all bad or doubtful debts due by foreign debtors, which were extremely difficult to collect, and required a long time, and the attention of foreign agents and travellers, which would not be at the command of a judicial factor. So far as recoverable the debts were being gradually recovered, and that in point of fact the debts due to the Dundee branch were in the same position, and had not been collected by the petitioner. This the petitioner admitted.

The respondent offered at the bar, either (1) to continue to do his best to recover these debts, which are all due abroad, and many of them in peculiar positions, and that, so far as the respondent was personally concerned, gratuitously; or (2) to concur with the petitioner in any steps the petitioner might suggest as to any or all of these debts. This offer was verbally rejected at the bar by the petitioner, who said he knew nothing whatever about these foreign debts.

The respondent then offered by minute, " (1) either to sell or to purchase the outstanding debts by sealed tender; or (2) to dispose of the whole outstanding debts by public roup, both parties being at liberty to bid."

The Lord Ordinary, on 10th May 1877, refused the prayer of the petition, and dismissed the same, with expenses.*

* "NOTE.—... The parties are at issue as to an accounting inter se. In particular, the petitioner says that the respondent has failed to account for his intrusions, and to exhibit proper balances and states of affairs of the Galashiels branch. The petitioner also says that he has various claims against the respondent, including apparently claims of damages—that he has entirely lost confidence in the respondent—that he mistrusts his action in the farther realisation of the debts—that he has asked in vain a full accounting; and he now seeks sequestration of the estates and the appointment of a judicial factor.

"The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties on 1st instant, continued the case for eight days that the petitioner might examine, with what assistance he chose, the Galashiels books, which, it appears, he had never yet done. On 9th current, however, he intimated that he declined to look at the books, or to say what should be done with any of the outstanding debts, or to give any assistance or advice either in recovering the debts of his own branch or those of the Galashiels branch, but that he simply insisted in the prayer of his petition.

"The Lord Ordinary, after full consideration, is of opinion that the petitioner is not entitled hoc statu to the sequestration of the debts and the appointment of a judicial factor.

"One of the main grounds, indeed the principal ground, on which the petitioner relied was, that the accounts between the two partners, that is, the co-account and reckoning inter socios, were in a state of confusion; that the books, and especially the Galashiels books, had not been properly kept; and that the respondent had failed to account for his intrusions; and he insisted that the first duty of the factor, if appointed, would be to call the respondent to account to examine into the respondent's whole intrusions, both during the partnership and since its dissolution, and to ascertain and fix the balance now due by the respondent to the petitioner.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot concur in this view. He thinks that when a judicial factor is appointed to wind up a company estate his primary duty is to realise outstanding assets, and not to settle past questions of accounting inter socios. No doubt his acting in realising may often facilitate the accounting inter socios, and when there is no dispute he will also distribute among the partners; but where serious disputes arise between the partners as to the shares, or as to their past actings, especially as to claims of damages, a factor has no judge of such matters. He has no power to give any binding deliverance

The petitioner reclaimed and argued;—Where the affairs of a partnership, and particularly a partnership in course of liquidation, had come to

No. 143.

June 19, 1877.

Gow v.
Schulze.

to take proof of any kind as between partners; and his probable course would be, in the case of serious differences, simply to consign the net funds recovered, and allow the partners to compete for them inter se by a multiplepointing or otherwise. Accordingly, if in any case there are no outstanding assets at all to recover—if, for example, in the present case, there had been no outstanding debts, the Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, would never sequestrate and appoint a judicial factor merely because there are unsettled disputes between the parties.

“The only ground therefore upon which, in the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, the present application can rest, is that a judicial factor is necessary in order to ingather the bad and doubtful debts still outstanding.

“But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that in the present case there is no necessity for the appointment of a judicial factor in order to collect or turn into value, as far as possible, the bad and doubtful debts still outstanding; on the contrary, he thinks that the appointment of a judicial factor for such a purpose would, in existing circumstances, probably lead to serious loss to both parties.

“As to the outstanding debts due to the Dundee branch of the business, the collection of these debts is now, and has hitherto been, under the charge of the petitioner himself, as was natural, the petitioner alone having managed the Dundee branch. The respondent stated at the bar that he was both willing and anxious that the petitioner should continue to realise these debts—that he committed the whole steps to be taken to the petitioner’s own discretion, giving the petitioner carte blanche, and the respondent’s full authority to do whatever the petitioner thinks best, and to take what assistance he thinks right. The respondent also offered his own advice and assistance whenever required. In reference to the Dundee debts, the Lord Ordinary thinks the petitioner can ask no more than this. The petitioner says that these Dundee debts are in danger of being lost; but if so, it must be the petitioner’s own fault. He has full power (both of his own and the respondent’s authority), to do whatever is necessary, or to employ agents to do what is necessary. In short, the petitioner can do, and do now, everything that a judicial factor could do, and he has knowledge and means of doing which a judicial factor could never have.”

“This leaves out the Galashiels outstanding debts. As to them also the respondent’s offers are fair and reasonable.” (After narrating the different offers made by the respondent as mentioned in the narrative)—

“The Lord Ordinary thinks that these offers are reasonable, and fully meet all that the petitioner can ask. It is both the manifest interest and the bounden duty of both partners to give their best services for winding up their own affairs, and, in the present case, it is thus alone that there is any hope of making anything of the Galashiels debts. They are all due abroad, chiefly apparently by billers in various cities in Italy, Sicily, Hungary, Austria, Russia, Turkey, Egypt, and elsewhere. They would almost certainly be lost if, as the petitioner suggests, a Glasgow or Dundee accountant should be employed to recover them, and it is difficult to say what expense might not be incurred. The petitioner is bound to concur with the respondent in taking the best and the most reasonable measures, or, if the partners cannot agree on this, then to sell or buy the debts inter se by tender or public auction. This is not unreasonable, two years having now elapsed. The petitioner is not entitled, as he has done for two years, to refuse to look at the Galashiels books, which, though kept by the respondent, are really the petitioner’s own books, and have always been at his command, and to insist on throwing the whole foreign debts into the hands of an accountant, with almost a certainty of their being lost. The petitioner has never yet made the suggestion as to what ought to be done as to any of the debts in question. Still less is the petitioner entitled to get an accountant who will litigate with the respondent at the expense of the firm,—that is, partly at the expense of the respondent himself. The partners must vindicate their rights inter se at their

No. 143. a dead-lock, through the fault of one or more of the partners, the Court would interfere by the sequestration of the estate and appointment of a judicial factor for the protection of the remaining partners. Here fault on the part of the respondent was abundantly shewn, and the risk the petitioner ran was that the debts of the Galashiels branch would not be ingathered, as the debtors were chiefly foreign customers, whom the respondent was endeavouring to secure for his own private business.¹

June 19, 1877.
Gow v.
Schulze.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am quite satisfied with the way in which the Lord Ordinary has dealt with this case. I think he has very properly refused the prayer of the petition, and that on very reasonable grounds. Such an application is without doubt quite competent, and may be entertained by the Court if there are circumstances sufficient to justify the appointment craved.

It is necessary therefore to see how the partners here are situated. Their partnership expired, according to their contract of copartnery, on 31st July 1875; their business had been carried on at Dundee and Galashiels, the Dundee branch being under the charge of the petitioner, while the respondent had charge of the Galashiels business. When the expiry of the contract arrived, the natural and obvious mode of winding up the business was that the petitioner should collect the outstanding debts of the Dundee business, and the respondent should wind up the business at Galashiels. It is admitted that the debts of the Dundee business are not yet all collected. That shews either that the petitioner has not been able to get them paid, or that he has been remiss in his duty of recovering them. It is not surprising, therefore, to hear that the same is true of the Galashiels branch. We have no means of knowing the extent of the debts outstanding on the Galashiels account. The statement made by the petitioner in his petition is that they amount to £5000. The statement he has now made at the bar puts them at £12,000. If the petitioner made the original statement without an examination of the books, which is the way he accounts for this discrepancy, he committed a very grave error indeed. But however that may be, we are left without any accurate information as to the facts.

The state of matters, then, is this :—The petitioner says that the respondent has failed to account to him in time past, and is not fit to be trusted with the collection of the debts still due. Now, it is a mistake to suppose that because parties are in dispute as to bygones between them the Court will listen to the petition of one of them to appoint a judicial factor upon the estate, who will in fact be an arbiter between the parties, instead of leaving the parties to take the ordinary remedy of an action of count and reckoning. As to the outstanding debts, it is impossible to entertain this application after the offers made by the respondent. He has lodged a minute in which he offers that the whole out-own risk and expense. In existing circumstances, therefore, and having regard to the respondent's offers, which meet almost every alternative, the Lord Ordinary refuses the petition."

¹ Authorities referred to.—Dixon v. Dixons, Dec. 22, 1831, 10 S. 178, 4 Scot. Jur. 215, 4 Deas and And. 446, Jan. 20, 1832, 10 S. 209, August 13, 1832, 5 Scot. Jur. 56, 6 W. and S. 229; Young v. Collins and Feely, Feb. 24, 1852, 14 D. 540, 24 Scot. Jur. 253, March 10, 1852, 14 D. 746, May 28, 1852, 14 D. 811, 24 Scot. Jur. 457, rev. March 14, 1853, 15 D., H. of L. 35, 25 Scot. Jur. 329, 1 Macq. 385; Dickie v. Mitchell, June 12, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1030; Russell v. Russell, Nov. 14, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 93; Miller v. Walker, Dec. 10, 1875, ante, vol. iii. p. 242; Bell's Com. M'Laren's ed. ii., 527, 535.

tanding debts due to the Galashiels branch should be exposed by auction, leave No. 143.
 being reserved to both parties to bid for them. The Lord Ordinary also informs is that the respondent's counsel offered at the bar—" (1) To continue to do his June 19, 1877.
 est to recover these debts, which are all due abroad, and many of them in pecu- Gow v. ar positions, and that, so far as the respondent is personally concerned, grati- Schulze.
 usly. (2) To concur with the petitioner in any steps the petitioner might suggest as to any or all of these debts." These offers would give the petitioner full redress against any of the charges which he brings against the respondent.
 This is a case in which, in accordance with the principles laid down in the case
Dickie v. Mitchell, the Court will not interfere, both parties being still alive.

LORD DEAS.—I have no doubt of the competency of the petition. But though competent it does not, of course, follow that its prayer should be granted. The whole matter in dispute between the parties is the mode of collecting the outstanding debts of the dissolved firm. It is a question of circumstances whether we ought to interfere, or whether our interference would not be likely to cause additional expense in the collection of the debts in place of facilitating that collection. I am of opinion that this is a case in which we ought not to interfere. I am satisfied with the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which come to this, that the debts can be better collected otherwise than by incurring the expense of a judicial management. I concur in the views expressed by your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, which I need not recapitu-late. I do not say that the time may not come when there may require to be sequestration and the appointment of a judicial factor on the partnership estate.
 But we do not make such appointments unless there be a necessity for them, or at least a clear expediency. I do not find that there is any such necessity or expediency here.

It is said to be a stronger thing to appoint a judicial factor in a going concern than in one which exists only for the purpose of winding up, and the petitioner's counsel went so far as to put it in the last case as a matter of right. But I can perceive stronger reasons for the appointment when the business is going on than when it has come to an end. Such, for instance, was Dixon's case, decided on August 1832, in the House of Lords (6 W. and S. 229), where it would have been ruinous all at once to stop the business, which was very extensive.
 There had been £6000 of duties paid to Government in October 1831, and another £6000 was to fall due immediately, for which a writ of extent had been or was about to be issued by the Crown. There may therefore be stronger reasons for appointing a judicial factor on a going business than where nothing remains to be done except an accounting between the partners.
 But this is always a question of circumstances, and here I see neither necessity nor expediency for granting the application.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—There is, I think, a good deal of force in the argument that a different rule should apply to such applications as the present in the case of a partnership with a going business, and in the case, which here occurs, of a com-
 - which has been dissolved, and where the only thing to be done is to realise assets, and settle the rights of partners. I think the argument is sound to extent, that the Court will more readily interfere in a case in which the comhas been dissolved—Bell's Com. M'Laren's ed. ii. 524. The consideration

No. 143. on which this rests is, that if the Court should appoint a judicial factor on the estate of a going concern there must follow the judicial management of a continuing partnership business, and nothing short of a case of necessity would justify this. The case of Dixon which has been referred to was a case of necessity. The partners of the company were all dead; and the Court authorised the factor to wind up the affairs of the company. After a dissolution of partnership it is different, and cases will from time to time occur in which the Court ought to interpose, and in which an appointment should be made to prevent injustice being done by one partner to the interests of another. I am of opinion that we ought not to appoint a judicial factor merely for the purpose of clearing up partnership accounts. But if there be good ground for doubt and dissatisfaction on the part of one partner of a dissolved company as to the credit or fidelity of another partner who is realising and appropriating the assets, or if the partners cannot agree on joint or separate measures for winding up the company, and there is consequently a danger of loss of the partnership property, a case arises in which a judicial factor should generally be appointed.

The present case is not one, however, in which I think the Court should interfere. A judicial factor is not the proper person to go into an accounting for past intromissions, at least the appointment would not be proper for that purpose only. The only reasonable ground is, that a sum of about £7000 is due to the company. This sum consists of numerous debts of small amount, and due by a great many persons in different countries. These debts scattered about in this way, could only be collected at very great expense by a judicial factor, who must employ foreign agents, and would have great difficulty in getting the information as to the debtors, and possible objections to the accounts. The respondent has, I think, in the circumstances, made a reasonable proposal to the petitioner in reference to these debts; and I think that one of his offers should be accepted by the petitioner, rather than that a judicial factor should be appointed.

THE COURT adhered.

WM. ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—JAMES W. MONCREIFF, W.S.—Agents.

No. 144. JAMES BREMNER AND ROBERT THOMSON, Pursuers and Respondents—Burnet—Low.

June 19, 1877. BURRELL AND SON, Defenders and Appellants.—Guthrie Smith—
Bremner & Another v. R. V. Campbell.
Burrell & Son.

Ship—Charter-party—Port of Discharge—Demurrage.—The schooner St. F. was chartered at S. to load a cargo of scrap iron, and “therewith proceed to Grangemouth, or so near thereunto as she may safely get.” The cargo was brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the merchant’s risk and expense. The vessel arrived in the roads at the mouth of the river Carron, on which the port of Grangemouth was situated, on 10th September, but the docks were full and she could not get a berth. On the 12th, being still unable to get into dock, the master brought the vessel into the river and moored her off the entrance of the docks. On the 13th the master intimated to the charterers that he was ready to discharge. It was proved that vessels frequently discharged cargoes of a similar character to that of the St. F. by means of lighters, while lying in the river in the same position, but there was no practice as to cargoes of scrap iron, the trade in which was of very recent introduction at Grangemouth.

Held that on 13th September the St. F. had reached her destination, and that the charterers were bound to commence the discharge on the following day.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff-Court at Falkirk at the instance of James Bremner and Robert Thomson, the owner and master of the schooner "St Fergus," to recover damage from the defenders, Burrell and Son, the charterers of the vessel.

No. 144.
June 19, 1877.
Bremner &
Another v.
Burrell & Son.
1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling.
M.

The circumstances of the case are stated in the interlocutor of the First Division of 19th June 1877 in disposing of an appeal from the Sheriff. They "find in fact that in terms of the charter-party and relative bill of lading; Nos. 13/1 and 11/1 of process, the pursuer (respondent) Robert Thomson, master of the ship 'St Fergus,' received on board said ship at Stettin a cargo of scrap iron and iron turnings from Messrs Hermann and Heilnehmer, merchants, Stettin, of which cargo the defenders (appellants) were the receivers: Find that the 'St Fergus' was chartered to proceed to Grangemouth, or so near thereunto as 'she may safely get, and deliver' the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, with nine working days for loading and unloading the ship, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying-days at £3 per day: Find that six of the said lay-days were occupied in loading, and only three lay-days remained for unloading when the ship sailed from Stettin: Find that the 'St Fergus' arrived in Carron on 10th September 1876, when the pursuer reported his arrival to the harbour-master, and on that or the following day he intimated his arrival to the defenders, but in consequence of their crowded state the pursuer was informed that the 'St Fergus' could not get into the harbour docks: Find that on 12th September the pursuer brought his ship to the Carron river about ten o'clock P.M., moored her in the stream at short distance above the 'Basket Point' or 'point of the quay,' at the entrance of the old harbour, with one hawser attached to a pawl on the point of the quay, and another attached to a pawl further up the river, and with an anchor in the stream forward, and with a kedge aft: Find that the old harbour is an ordinary and recognised place for discharging cargoes of all sorts: Find that on the following day, the 13th September, intimations, No. 8/3 of process, was left by the pursuer with the defenders, but they refused to take delivery where the vessel lay, on the ground that she had not arrived at a proper or usual place for discharging: Find that by letter of 15th September, 8/4 of process, the pursuer intimated that the lay-days had expired, and that the ship would henceforth lie on demurrage, and the pursuer thereafter handed from day to day the accounts for demurrage, 8/5 to 8/15 of process, inclusive: Find that the 'St Fergus' lay in the place aforesaid in the river until the morning of 20th September, when, by order of the harbour-master, she was moved into the docks, but no railway berth was clear, and the discharge did not begin until the morning of the 22d September: Find that the discharge was completed on the 28th September: Find that the river Carron at the place 'above the point of the quay' where the 'St Fergus' was moored on 12th September, is outwith the limits of the harbour of Grangemouth belonging to the Caledonian Railway Company, but is within the legal limits of the port of Grangemouth, and is a place recognised by the Custom-house officials for the legal discharge of cargoes: Find that when the harbour and docks happen to be crowded cargoes of all sorts, including silver-sand, flints, coals, loam, sand, and sulphur ore, are frequently discharged by means of lighters from vessels lying in that part of the river Carron which is a public navigable river, and although the discharges take place generally by arrangement between the charterer and shipmaster, they take place sometimes irrespective of any arrangement: Find that cargoes can be so discharged by lighters with safety, if proper and ordinary precautions are taken, and that there

No. 144. is no peculiarity as regards scrap iron to prevent it from being discharged safely in a similar manner, and that no unreasonable amount of expense or inconvenience would be incurred in so discharging such a cargo, even though, as in the present instance, the consignees might intend to send it by railway: Find that the importation of scrap iron by way of Grangemouth has existed—unless to a very trifling extent—for only a year or eighteen months, so that although it has during that time been usual to discharge such cargoes at a railway berth in the docks, there is no established custom of the port, nor is there any compulsory law as to the place where such cargoes should be discharged.”

June 19, 1877.
Bremner &
Another v.
Burrell & Son.

The Sheriff-substitute (Bell) found that the lay-days began to run on 14th September, and there being only three lay-days left, expired on 16th September, and that from that day till the 28th September the vessel was on demurrage. He gave decree for £30, being demurrage for ten working days, at £3, as stipulated in the charter-party.

The Sheriff (Lee) adhered on appeal.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders' agents at Stettin chartered the “Fergus” by charter-party, dated 23d August 1876, to load there a cargo of 12 tons scrap iron, and “proceed to Grangemouth, or so near thereunto as she may safely get.” The charter-party is in the usual terms. The vessel arrived at Carron roads on 10th September, and on that day the master reported his arrival to the harbour-master. On the following day he intimated the same to the defenders. Finding, however, that from the crowded state of the docks his vessel could not get either into the Caledonian Railway dock or into the old harbour, the master, on 12th September, brought her into the Carron river, and moored her at the entrance of the old harbour. One hawser was attached to a pawl on the quay, and another was attached to a pawl further up the river. An anchor was dropped in the stream both fore and aft.

When he had got his vessel moored in that position the master, on 13th September, intimated to the defenders that she was ready to discharge her cargo. The defenders refused to take delivery where the vessel lay. And the question is, whether their refusal was justifiable.

The defenders maintain that the vessel had not arrived at a usual place of discharge at the port of Grangemouth. On the other hand the owner maintains that the vessel had arrived at the port of Grangemouth, and at a usual place of discharge,—not for cargoes of this particular kind, for it is admitted that the shipment of scrap iron to the port of Grangemouth being a novelty, there is no practice with reference to such cargoes,—but a usual place of discharge for cargoes generally, such as come to that port. As there is no practice with reference to the particular kind of cargo the question comes to depend on the evidence whether or not it was a reasonable demand that the defenders should take delivery at the place where the vessel lay. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have come to the result that it was a reasonable demand. Though the case is a narrow one on the evidence I cannot arrive at any different conclusion.

¹ Authorities.—Brereton v. Chapman, 1831, 7 Bing. 559; Brown v. Johnson, 1842, 10 Mees. and Wel. 331; Kell v. Anderson, 1842, 10 Mees. and Wel. 498; “Norden” Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 1876, L. R., 1 C. P. Div. 634; Hillstrom v. Gibson and Clark, Feb. 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 463, 42 Scot. Jur. 217; La Cour v. Donaldson and Son, May 22, 1874, ante, vol. i. 912; Dall' Ongaro v. Meeson and Co., Feb. 4, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 419.

ere is evidence that many other vessels have discharged there, by means of No. 144.
 hters, cargoes differing widely in their nature,—silver-sand, flints, coal, loam, June 19, 1877.
 d, and sulphur ore, and other things. It is quite true that there is no evi- Bremner & ce of any cargo of scrap iron having been discharged there. But I am not Another v.
 ished that there was any difficulty attending the discharge of scrap iron at Burrell & Son.
 place which would not have equally attended the discharge of any of the er materials above mentioned.

There is no difficulty in the rule of law which is recognised both here and in gland. A vessel, where she undertakes to go to a certain port does not fulfil obligation unless she goes either to the appointed place of discharge or to a al place of discharge. But I am of opinion that the obligation in this case fulfilled, and that the charterers, though they desired to get the vessel into railway dock for the purpose of discharging on to trucks, could not reason-r refuse to take delivery where the ship lay when the result was to be to se delay. I am therefore for dismissing the appeal.

ORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—(After the findings in fact quoted in the narrative, supra, p. 935)—“Find in law that the ‘St Fergus’ having been on 12th September moored at a safe and usual place for discharging cargoes in the river Carron, and, sepa- ratim, the ship having arrived at the old harbour where one of its hawsers was attached to a pawl on ‘the point of the quay,’ and a requisition having been made on the 13th September by the pursuer on the defenders to take delivery where the vessel lay, the lay-days began to run upon the morning of the 14th September, and expired upon Saturday the 16th: Find that the vessel lay on demurrage from that date until the 28th September inclusive, being a period of ten working days, at £3 per day, and that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in the sum of £30 sterling in name of demurrage: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses,” &c.

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—JOHN WILSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

N TRAILL AND OTHERS (Caithness' Trustees), First Parties.—Durling. No. 145.

MARGARET NICOLL OR CAITHNESS, Second Party.—Jameson.

DAVID WILSON, Third Party.—Keir.

June 20, 1877.
 Caithness'
 Trustees v.
 Caithness.

usband and Wife—Jus Relictæ—Approbate and Reprobate.—Held that a mortis causa settlement disposes of the whole estate of the granter his is not entitled to take provisions under it and at the same time claim her rights.

ust—Discretionary Powers of Trustees.—A truster left the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and gave power to the trustees to advances out of capital to one of two fiars during the currency of the life-the expediency of doing so being left “to the exclusive judgment” of the ees, “without control or interference from any party whatever.” Held the widow had no power to veto the trustees in making advances out of al.

WILLIAM CAITHNESS, corn merchant, Arbroath, died on 11th February 2^D DIVISION.
 t, survived by his widow, Mrs Margaret Nicoll or Caithness. There R.
 no issue of the marriage, but Mrs Caithness had a daughter by a er marriage, Mary Ann Gordon, who was married to David Wilson,

No. 145. and who had two children, William Caithness Wilson and Margaret Nicoll Wilson. All these survived Mr Caithness.

June 20, 1877.
Caithness'
Trustees v.
Caithness.

The only deed regulating Mr Caithness' succession was a trust-disposition and settlement executed by him on 2d May 1862. This deed proceeded on the narrative that the truster had "resolved to make the following settlement of his affairs." John Traill, surgeon, Arbroath, and two others, were nominated trustees, and to them were conveyed "All and sundry lands, . . . debts, . . . and, in general, the whole subjects and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, owing and belonging, or which shall be owing and belonging to," the truster at the time of his decease. The trust-purposes were—(1) for payment of debts; (2) for payment of any legacies the truster might bequeath; (3) the liferent of household furniture and effects to his widow; (4) the yearly proceeds of the residue of the whole estate, to be paid to his widow, "declaring that in the event of the said free yearly revenue of my said estate not yielding, in the opinion of my said trustees, a sum sufficient to afford a suitable maintenance to my said wife, they are hereby fully empowered and required to advance to her yearly out of the capital funds of my estate such a sum as will, with the said free revenue, comfortably support her; provided always that the sum so to be advanced from the capital funds shall not, when added to the said free revenue, exceed in any one year £40 sterling; providing, nevertheless, that in case the said free yearly revenue shall exceed the said sum of £40 sterling, my said wife shall be entitled to receive the whole free revenue, my intention in said restriction being to prevent undue encroachment on the stock."

The deed then proceeded:—"Fifthly, in respect I wish to provide for the education of William Caithness Wilson, eldest son of Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson, my said wife's daughter, . . . therefore, in case the said William Caithness Wilson shall be in minority at the time of my death, and his education or training in business uncompleted, I hereby empower my said trustees to expend such sum or sums, from time to time, from the capital funds of my estate, in or towards the education or training in business of the said William Caithness Wilson, as they in their discretion shall consider fit—the amount and expediency of expending such sums being left by me to the exclusive judgment of my said trustees, without control or interference from any party whatever. Sixthly, on the said William Caithness Wilson, attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, and desiring to engage in a profession or business, and being, in the opinion of my trustees, qualified for so engaging, they are hereby authorised and empowered to advance to the said William Caithness Wilson to account of his share of the residue of my estate from the capital funds of my estate such sum or sums (not exceeding in whole the estimated amount of his share therein), as they shall consider necessary for this purpose; . . . but declaring that the expediency of making such advance is left by me to the exclusive judgment of my said trustees, without control or interference from any party whatever. . . . Seventhly, in case the said Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson shall at any time during the liferent of my said estate by my said wife be placed in such circumstances as, in the opinion of my said trustees, to require pecuniary assistance, I hereby authorise and empower them to advance to her or apply for her behoof from the capital funds of my estate, from time to time, such sum or sums as they in their discretion shall consider fit—the amount and expediency of making such payments being left by me to the exclusive judgment of my said trustees, without control or interference from any person whatever; declaring always, that my said trustees shall only be at liberty to advance or apply such sums to or for behoof of the said Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson No. 145.

 during the liferent of my said estate by the said Mrs Margaret Nicoll or faithness, and no longer." The eighth purpose gave the liferent of the June 20, 1877.
 residue of the estate to Mrs Wilson in the event of her surviving her Caithness' Trustees v.
 mother. "And lastly, the residue of my said estate shall belong to the Caithness.
 lawful child or children of the said Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson live at the death of the last survivor of me and my said wife, and the said Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson, and that equally between and among them, share and share alike, if there shall be more than one (except that the said William Caithness Wilson shall receive double the share of the other child or children)." The deed contained no clause or expression excluding the legal rights of the truster's widow.

The estate having been realised amounted to about £1200, and the annual return was between £45 and £50.

Doubts having arisen as to the construction of several of the clauses of the trust-deed a special case was prepared, to which the trustees were the first parties, Mrs Caithness the second party, and David Wilson, as administrator-in-law for his two children, the third party.

The questions submitted were as follows :—“(1) Is the truster's widow, the second party, entitled to the conventional provisions in her favour under the trust-disposition and settlement of her husband, the said William Caithness, and also to her legal claims of jus relictæ, and an allowance for mournings and aliment to the first term after her husband's death, or is she bound to make her election between the said conventional provisions and legal claims? (2) If the second party be not bound to make her election, and shall take both her conventional provisions and legal claims, will she in that event be entitled to have the income of the residue to which she is entitled under the trust-disposition and settlement made up out of capital to £40 per annum? (3) Assuming that the second party is bound to make her election as between said conventional provisions and her legal claims, and accepts the provisions in her favour under the said trust-disposition and settlement, or that she is entitled to both her legal claims and conventional provisions, are the first parties entitled, without her consent, to encroach on the capital of the estate, and give effect to any or all of the fifth, sixth, and seventh purposes of the trust-settlement? Or can she prevent the first parties from encroaching on the capital of the funds, except for the purpose of making up therefrom an annuity or sum of £40 payable to her? (4) When will the shares of the residue vest?”

Argued for the trustees ;—(1) Although the deed did not expressly exclude the legal rights of the widow, that must be implied from the whole scope of the deed, and she could not both avail herself of these rights and take the conventional provisions under the trust-deed.¹ (2) The deed expressly gave the trustees power to make advances from capital without interference from any one, and so the widow could have no voice in the matter. (3) The fee of the residue would not vest until the death of the longest liver of Mrs Caithness and Mrs Wilson, the liferentrices.²

Argued for Mrs Caithness ;—There being no exclusion of the legal

¹ Riddell v. Dalton, Nov. 28, 1781, M. 6457; Young v. Buchanans, Dec. 2,
 1814, M. 6447; Bell v. Laurie, May 14, 1801, Hume's Dec. 486; Breadalbane's
 Trustees v. Duke of Buckingham, March 5, 1840, 2 D. 731, 12 Scot. Jur. 400; Leith v. Kirkpatrick, May 20, 1842, 4 D. 1224, 14 Scot. Jur. 395; Leigh
 v. Russell, Dec. 1, 1852, 15 D. 126, 25 Scot. Jur. 63; Keith's Trustees v.
 Keith, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1040, 29 Scot. Jur. 497; Ersk. Inst. iii. 3, 30.
² Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 337, 34 Scot. Jur. 270.

- No. 145. rights of the widow in the settlement, it must be concluded that the truster knowing of these rights had intended the provision which he had made for his wife to be in addition to her legal rights. Such an exclusion could not be implied.¹ The widow had sufficient interest in the capital to entitle her to veto its being unnecessarily squandered.

June 20, 1877.
Caithness'
Trustees v.
Caithness.

LORD ORMDALE.—The questions submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court will be taken up in their order.

1. The first question is whether the widow of the testator is entitled to both her legal and her conventional provisions under his settlement. I am very clearly of opinion, on principle as well as the authorities, that she is not entitled to take both provisions, but must make her election. The testator has disposed of the universitas of his estate. It is impossible to look at his settlement without being satisfied that this is so. Unless it were to be held that no settlement can be dealt with as disposing of the universitas of the testator's estate, except where that is expressly stated, the universitas has been disposed of in the present instance, for nothing could be more comprehensive in that respect than the language of the deed in question. I am therefore of opinion that the testator intended to dispose of the whole means and estate which he died possessed of, without any exception, and that being so, this case falls under the rule recognised and given effect to in the cases which were cited as precedents. Accordingly it must be held in answer to the first question that the second party is not entitled to both her conventional and legal claims, but must make her election.

2. That answer supersedes the second question.

3. The third question proceeds upon the assumption that the widow is put to her election and has chosen her conventional provisions. Is she, then, entitled to prevent the trustees from encroaching on the capital of the estate? The trustees have no personal interest in the matter. It is their duty to carry into effect, so far as they can, the instructions and objects of the testator. He has authorised them, in certain circumstances, but only if they find it advisable, to make advances out of the capital. The smallness of the estate creates a difficulty in connection with this, but the trustees must just act as they see right, not capriciously, but in the exercise of a wise and prudent discretion. The expediency of making these advances is left entirely to them, and I have no doubt they will act rightly. In these circumstances they will probably think that they cannot venture to make any advances, but that is for their consideration. The widow does not appear to me to have any right to interfere with the trustees in the exercise of their discretion. This third question will therefore fall to be answered in accordance with these views.

4. With regard to the fourth question as to vesting, any dispute regarding it was substantially given up at the bar, the matter being too clear for argument. The answer is that the shares of residue will vest on the death of the last survivor of the testator, his widow, and Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and that without any difficulty.

The testator here has made a universal settlement regarding the disposal his whole estate, both heritable and moveable, of every description. It is impossible to read his trust-deed without seeing this. It proceeds on the narrative that he has resolved to make a "settlement of his affairs," and he conveys to the trustees all his means and estate. The deed is thus intended to regulate his whole succession at the date of his death.

¹ Cross v. Boyes, Jan. 16, 1801, Hume's Dec. 484; Thomson v. Smith, Dec. 8, 1849, 12 D. 276, 22 Scot. Jur. 72.

No. 145.

June 20, 1877.
Caithness'
Trustees v.
Caithness.

In these circumstances the widow says that she has a claim to her legal provisions of terce and of jus relicte, as she has never renounced or discharged these legal rights. On the other side it was conceded that these rights were not excluded, and that the widow if she chose might claim such provisions; but the trustees maintain that if the widow avails herself of her right, and if she does claim these legal provisions, amounting to one-half of her husband's free moveable estate, she is in that case not entitled, in addition, to the conventional provisions in her favour contained in the deed. I am of opinion that the contention of the trustees is well founded, and that the widow is not entitled to demand both her legal rights and her conventional provisions, but that she must make her choice, and take either the one or the other, but not both, and in doing so she will no doubt be guided by the amount which she will get upon either alternative. In particular, I think, she must take her chance of the exercise of the power by the trustees to make advances out of capital to the grandchildren.

I cannot doubt that it was the intention of the testator that if the widow elected to take her jus relicte she should renounce her conventional provisions. To give her both would dislocate the whole arrangements of the testator, and rearrange the whole provisions of his deed. The first question will therefore fall to be answered to that effect, and the second question is thereby superseded. With regard to the third question, if the widow elects to take her conventional provisions I think she will be bound by all the directions in the settlement. In particular, I think she will not be entitled to object to the trustees exercising discretionary powers which the truster has conferred upon them of advancing parts of the capital to certain parties, and in certain circumstances. The fifth, sixth, and seventh provisions in the deed are just conditional legacies depending upon the discretion of the trustees. If the trustees, in the sound and reasonable exercise of their discretion, find it proper and necessary that these advances be made, then they must form a deduction from the residue of the estate.

I am therefore of opinion that the trustees have the power to advance out of capital to the grandchildren if they see proper, and I do not think that the widow has any power of veto upon their doing so.

The only other question relates to the vesting of the residue, and I am of opinion that the vesting of the residue is necessarily postponed till the death of the last of the parties named in the deed, for it is not until that event happens that the class can be ascertained to whom the residue is payable. The resid legatees are the children who may be alive at the occurrence of the event mentioned, so that survivance is a condition of the vesting, and until this condition is purified no vesting can take place.

LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords are of opinion, and

No. 145.

June 20, 1877.
'Caithness'
 Trustees v.
Caithness.

find (1) that the widow is not entitled to the conventional and legal provisions, but is bound to make her election; (2) this query superseded by the answer to the first query; (3) that the first parties are entitled, without the widow's consent, if they should see fit, in the exercise of a wise and prudent discretion, to encroach on the capital so as to give effect to any or all of the fifth, sixth, and seventh purposes of the trust-settlement; (4) that the shares of residue vest on the death of the last survivor of the testator, his widow, and Mrs Mary Ann Gordon or Wilson, and deern."

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—ROBERT STRATHERN, W.S.—
 GRAHAM BINNEY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 146.

June 22, 1877.
 Fraser v.
 Downie.

ROBERT FRASER, Appellant and Complainer.—Kinnear—Mackintosh.
 ROBERT DOWNIE, Respondent.—Balfour—Lorimer.

Property—Feu—Restriction.—All the feuars in a street held of a common superior under titles containing a restriction to the effect that "the houses to be built should all be single or self-contained lodgings." One of the feuars was proceeding to convert his house into business offices when an adjoining feuar objected. During the previous thirty years a large number of houses in the street had been converted, without objection, including two houses within the last three years in the immediate neighbourhood. Held that the right of the feuars to object had been lost by abandonment.

Question, whether a restriction in the above terms was a permanent obligation. Opinion (per Lord Shand), that the restriction applied only in the erection of houses, and not to the use of the houses when erected.

1st DIVISION.
 Dean of Guild of Glasgow.
 M.

ROBERT DOWNIE, accountant, proprietor of two contiguous self-contained dwelling-houses, Nos. 241 and 243 West George Street, Glasgow, intending to make certain additions and alterations with a view to converting them into writing chambers and counting-houses to be occupied by seven tenants, applied to the Dean of Guild for a lining.

The petition was opposed by Robert Fraser, the proprietor of adjoining houses in the street, on various grounds, among others that it would be contravention of Downie's title to convert the houses into offices.

The titles of both parties flowed from a common author, Archibald Campbell of Blythswood, and contained this restriction,—“Declaring that the houses to be built should all be single or self-contained lodgings.”

The Dean of Guild granted the lining. Fraser appealed, and brought relative suspension and interdict.

It appeared in evidence that all the feus in West George Street were held of the same superior and under similar though not identical restrictions, and that the process of converting dwelling-houses into business offices had been going on for thirty years, gradually extending westward. In the division of the street in which the houses of the parties were, consisting of seven houses on each side, two or three had been converted, all within the last three years.

It was disputed by Downie, but held to be established, that the restrictions in the titles, so far as binding, were mutually enforceable by the feuars.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question whether the provision in the charter that

* There were also restrictions as to height, which Downie at first maintained that he was entitled to disregard, but he acquiesced in them by minute in the Court of Session.

uses are to be self-contained lodgings constitutes a permanent obligation, as regards the mode of occupation, is one which it is not necessary to determine. It appears clearly on the evidence that in West George Street there has been going on for a considerable time a process of conversion of self-contained lodgings into business premises. This process has already extended as far as the utmost part of Brandon Place, because I observe that two houses there had been converted into business premises as far back as 1874, one next door to the appellant and the other nearly opposite. If this had been totally unexpected it might have been intelligible that the appellant should not understand what was going on, as the change did not involve the structural alteration of the outside of the building; but he must have been aware of his peril, because the conversion had been carried out in the eastern part of the street to a great extent, and was extending westwards rapidly. If he had any objection he ought to have made it forward and protested at the time when his own part of the street was changed. But that he did not do, and I think he is not now entitled to maintain his objection.

No. 146.

June 22, 1877.
Fraser v.
Downie.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the result arrived at by your Lordship; but I think it right to observe that all the alterations in the portion of West George Street now more immediately in dispute have been made within the last three or four years, and if there were nothing more in the case, there might be some room to object in holding Mr Fraser and others barred from objecting to proposed alterations on Mr Downie's premises, simply because they had not at once objected to similar alterations on some houses in the same compartment of the street. But when we take that fact in connection with the history of this whole street, and the manner in which it has been dealt with, both by the superior and the feuars, all hesitation is removed.

The street called West George Street is, and has all along been, divided into compartments by other streets crossing it; but the whole street, inclusive of the tenements, was laid out as what are familiarly known in Edinburgh and Glasgow as self-contained dwelling-houses, and the restrictions were directed to securing the amenity and uniformity of a street of that kind, a leading restriction being that the houses should not exceed in height two square stories and a half story. The feu-rights in the street were all granted either by the Parliamentary trustees of Blythswood or by the proprietor himself, and are therefore to be regarded as having flowed from one common author. I assume, for the purposes of this case, that the restrictions were well imposed. Some difference of opinion has been occasionally expressed as to whether the title of the feuars entitles them to enforce, inter se, the restrictions in their feu-rights rests upon the implied contract or upon the principle of jus quaesitum tertio; but, in either case, the feu-charter or feu-contract, in which the superior imposes these restrictions upon each individual feu, must be regarded as that which creates the common tie, for there is no express contract between the feuars themselves, and no direct grant by the superior to his feuars as a body.

The first loosening of the common tie in West George Street was the act of the feuars on the south side of one of the compartments, who in 1854 entered into an agreement, which was recorded in the General Register of Sasines in the month of that year, to depart from the restriction as to the height of the houses on that side of the compartment. An agreement to a similar effect was entered into by the feuars on the north side of the same compartment in 1858, and was

No. 146. recorded in the Register of Sasines on 2d February 1859. These agreements were followed by the addition of a story to a number of the houses on both sides of the compartment. In 1866, the Clydesdale Banking Company having purchased one of the feus on the north side of the compartment just referred to, commenced to erect upon it a large and handsome building, in a different style from the dwelling-houses, and intended to be three stories in height, to be used for the purposes of their business, whereupon the superior presented a suspension and interdict to stop the progress of the work, and brought a declarator to have it found and declared that the building would be a violation of the restrictions stipulated in the feu-right. The Court, however, found that, as the restrictions had been disregarded as to the style and height of other houses in the same compartment, and the superior had taken no proceedings against the feuars who had so disregarded them, he was not entitled to enforce the restrictions against the proprietors of the particular feu there in question—Campbell v. The Clydesdale Banking Company, 19th June 1868, 6 Macph. 943.

That judgment, I take it, virtually bars the superior from now objecting to the conversion of dwelling-houses, in all or any of the compartments of West George Street into business premises, and consequently he could not object although he were inclined to do so, to the proceedings of Mr Downie, so far as the latter has that object in view. I do not say that because the superior is barred from objecting, it necessarily follows that Mr Fraser and the other feuars are also barred from objecting inter se; but the proceedings and judgment of 1868 were, to say the least of them, calculated to call their attention to the advancing progress, in their own compartment, of the conversion of dwelling-houses into business premises, which had begun farther off in 1854 and 1858, and consequently go to strengthen and complete the bar against their now objecting to similar conversions in their own compartment. The acquiescence of Mr Fraser and his neighbours is really to be regarded as acquiescence in a gradual and steady change of the character of the whole street, which has in a manner forced itself on the locality (luckily to the gain, and not to the loss of the proprietors) by the necessities of a rapid and extraordinary increase in the trade, commerce, and population of the city of Glasgow.

It does not follow, however, that because the houses may be converted into business premises there are no restrictions left which it may still be right and reasonable to enforce. Your Lordship does not take that view, and in what you have said upon that subject I entirely concur.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and I merely wish to add, with reference to the observations of Lord Deas, as I understood your Lordship, that I reserve my opinion as to what the right of a vassal may be in a case of this description, where the superior may have waived his right to enforce restrictions. When a superior has conferred upon his vassal an absolute right to object to alterations proposed to be made by other vassals I should hesitate to hold that such a right can be put an end to by the superior waiving his own right to object. There must, I should think, be some act or omission on the part of the vassal himself to lead to that result.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with your Lordship in holding that there has been such an abandonment by the feuars generally, including the appellant, of the conditions of the feu-rights on which the appellant now insists, as to preclude the appellant from succeeding in his objections. No. 146.

But, though it is not necessary for the judgment, I desire to add that I am not satisfied that the titles impose an obligation to occupy the houses as self-contained lodgings, or which could prevent their occupation as business premises. The restrictions as to the style and height of buildings directly affect the subjects, and are expressed in terms prescribing certain requirements and prohibiting deviations, and these would have been effectual if there had been no use of abandonment. But, with regard to the question of use or occupation, all that the deed provides is "that the houses to be built upon the ground above described shall all be single or self-contained lodgings." The building having been erected of this character, there is no provision limiting the mode of its use or occupation thereafter, and none prohibiting its use by several occupants, or use otherwise than as a self-contained lodging. Such serious restrictions on the use of property by its owner are not to be lightly inferred. I should rather say they must be distinctly expressed to be effectual. As I read this deed, the feuar was content to have self-contained buildings erected, in the knowledge that from the nature and situation of the property it would be the feuar's interest to use it, but that he left the feuar free to change that use, if, with the lapse of time, he saw fit to make a change. The opinion of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Penzance) in the case of Inglis v. Boswell, May 1849 (6 Bell's Appeals, 427), on the passage on page 439 of the report, is directly in point, and expresses the view which I entertain on this question, as the title is here expressed.

June 22, 1877.
Fraser v. Downie.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and repelled the reasons of suspension.

MACDONALD & HARE, W.S.—MACBRAIR & KEITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID BAIRD WAUCHOPE (Samuel Wauchope's Executor), First Party.— No. 147.
Kinnear—Mure.

MRS CATHERINE BALDOCK FAGAN or WAUCHOPE, Second Party.—
Asher—Hunter.

June 23, 1877.
Wauchope v. Wauchope.

Domicile—Succession.—A Scotchman entered the civil service of the East India Company in 1841, and remained in it until his death in 1875, when he was on a two years' furlough in Europe. The servants of the East India Company were transferred to the Crown in 1858 by 21 and 22 Vict., cap. 106. The Indian Council Act, 1865, of the Indian Council, sets forth, in an "Explanation," that a man is not to be considered as having taken up his fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in her Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling." Held that neither the Act of 1858 nor the Act of Council of 1865 affected the domicile the deceased had acquired before they were passed in British India, and that his domicile was that at the date of his death.

SAMUEL WAUCHOPE, C.B., was born in Scotland, of Scottish parents, in the year 1822. 2D DIVISION.
R.

In 1841 he entered the civil service of the East India Company (as a Civil Presidency); in 1842 he went to British India; and at the time of his death, which took place at Engelberg, Switzerland, on 23d July 1875, he was in the service of the Crown in British India, the government having been transferred to her Majesty in 1858 by the statute 21 and 22 Vict., cap. 106.

No. 147. During the period of his service he had visited Scotland twice on short leave, and once on furlough. In 1873 he left British India, having obtained leave of absence on furlough for two years, together with five days subsidiary leave, from October 23, 1873, and returned to Scotland, where he resided in a house rented by the year, the lease of which to Whitsunday 1876 was current at his death. During the summer of 1875 he went abroad on account of his health, and died of the date above mentioned. At the time of his death he had served the requisite number of years to entitle him to retire from service, but he had not retired from service, and was in receipt of furlough allowance at the time of his death.

June 23, 1877.
Wauchope v.
Wauchope.

In 1843 the deceased married at Calcutta Miss Catherine Baldock Fagan, who was Irish by birth. Of this marriage three children, daughters survived.

Mr Wauchope entered into no contract of marriage with his wife. On 21st July 1875, being two days before his death, he executed a will, his signature to which was attested in the English form.

Mr Wauchope left no heritable property in Great Britain, but he did possess of moveable estate in Scotland, moveable estate in England, and moveable and real estate in British India. There was no express exclusion of the legal rights of his widow.

In his will Mr Wauchope appointed his brother David Baird Wauchope his executor as regarded his property in Europe, and certain other persons executors in India. Mrs Wauchope having asserted a claim to one-third of the moveable estate of her late husband as falling to her jure relicte on the footing that Mr Wauchope's domicile was a Scotch one, a question arose as to Mr Wauchope's domicile, and a special case was presented to the Court. To this special case Mr D. B. Wauchope as executor nominate was the first party, and Mrs Wauchope, the deceased's widow, the second party.

It was maintained by the first party that Mr Wauchope had lost his domicile of origin, and acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile. If his domicile at his death was Anglo-Indian, it was admitted that his succession must be regulated by the law of England, and that by that law his widow was not entitled to any portion of his moveable estate disposed of by his will, except the legacy of furniture thereby bequeathed to her. On the other hand, it was maintained by the second party that, under the provisions of the Succession Act, 1865, of the Indian Council, the domicile of the deceased was Scotch, that his succession must be regulated by the law of Scotland, and that his widow was entitled jure relicte to one-third of his moveable estate.

The portions of the "Indian Succession Act, 1865," founded upon the case were the following:—(2) Except as provided by this Act, by any other law for the time being in force, the rules herein contained shall constitute the law of British India applicable to all cases of intestate or testamentary succession. . . . (5) Succession to the immoveable property in British India of a person deceased is regulated by the law of British India, wherever he may have had his domicile at the time of his death. Succession to the moveable property of a person deceased is regulated by the law of the country in which he had his domicile at the time of his death. . . . (9) The domicile of origin prevails until a new domicile has been acquired. (10) A man acquires a new domicile by taking up his fixed habitation in a country which is not that of his domicile of origin. Explanation.—A man is not to be considered as having taken up his fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in her Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling. . . . (11) Any person may acquire a domicile in British India by making and depositing in some office in British India (to be fixed by the local government) a declaration in writing under his hand of his desire to acquire such domicile, provided that he shall have been resident in British India for one year immediately preceding the time of his making such declaration. . . . (13) A new domicile continues until the former domicile has been acquired. . . . (19) If a man dies leaving moveable property in British India, in the absence of proof of any domicile elsewhere, succession to the property is regulated by the law of British India." No. 147.

June 23, 1877.
Wauchope v. Wauchope.

The questions submitted were:—“(1) Was the domicile of the deceased Samuel Wauchope Scotch at the time of his death? (2) (3)”

Argued for Mr Wauchope's executor;—By becoming a civil servant of the H. E. I. Company in India in 1842 Mr Wauchope became a domiciled Anglo-Indian for purposes of succession.¹ An acquired domicile could not be lost merely by leaving the country in which it had been acquired; it remained in force until a new one was acquired to take its place, and any change must be both animo et facto.² Mr Wauchope had, under the principle laid down in Bruce's³ case, already acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile when the Succession Act of 1865 was passed, and there was nothing in that Act to change his domicile.

Argued for Mrs Wauchope;—The moment that Mr Wauchope ceased to be the servant of a private company, and was transferred to the service of the Crown by the Act of 1858, he fell under the rule that servants of the Crown retained their domicile of origin.⁴

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The questions which here arise as to the domicile of the late Mr Samuel Wauchope have not, as far as I am aware, been made the subject of any authoritative judgment. They are, first, whether the transference of the territory and administration of British India from the East India Com-

¹ Bruce v. Bruce, April 15, 1790, 3 Pat. App. 163, and 2 Bosanquet and Haller, 229, note; Craigie v. Lewin, Feb. 28, 1843, 3 Curteis' Eccles. Rep. 5.

² Munro v. Douglas, July 3, 1820, 5 Maddock, 379; Forbes v. Forbes, Feb. 1854, 23 L. J. Chanc. 724; Moorhouse v. Lord, March 19, 1863, 32 L. J. Chanc. 295, 9 Jur. 677; Allardice v. Onslow, Jan. 23, 1864, 10 Jur. 352; May v. Udny, June 3, 1869, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 89, 41 Scot. Jur. 457, L. R. 1 and Div. App. 441; Kennedy v. Bell, May 14, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 69, Scot. Jur. 476, L. R. 1 Sc. and Div. App. 307; Aikman v. Aikman, March 1861, 23 D., H. L. 3, 3 Macq. 854, 33 Scot. Jur. 363; Whicker v. Hume, Feb. 14, 1851, 20 L. J. Chanc. 369; Hamilton v. Dallas, Nov. 9, 1875, L. R. Chanc. Div. 257; Savigny's Private International Law (Guthrie's trans.) 59, note D; In re Cap de Veille, June 13, 1864, 2 Hurl. and Colt., Ch. 985.

Supra, note 1.

Munro v. Munro, Nov. 15, 1837, 16 Sh. 18, Lord Moncreiff, p. 35, 10 Scot. Jur. 58, H. L., Aug. 10, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 492, 13 Scot. Jur. 606; Macdonald v. Lang, Nov. 27, 1794, M. 4627; Drevon v. Drevon, June 13, 1864, 34 L. J. Chanc. 129, V. C. Kindersley, 134; Hook v. Hook, Feb. 7, 1862, 24 D. 488, Scot. Jur. 245.

No. 147. pany to the Crown has altered the status or domicile of the civil servants of the June 23, 1877. Crown in that country? and secondly, whether, if it be not so, that status and Wauchope v. domicile is affected by the recent Act of 1865 of the Indian Council, entitled Wauchope. "an Act to amend and define the law of intestate and testamentary succession in British India?"

In regard to the first of these questions, I assume it to have been conclusively decided in the case of Bruce, and the other decisions which followed on Lord Thurlow's judgment in that case, that residence in India in the service of the East India Company, either in a civil or military capacity, constituted an Indian, and therefore, for the purposes of succession, an English domicile. It may, no doubt, be a question whether the views on which this result was arrived at were altogether unimpeachable, but it has been confirmed in so many subsequent cases that it seems to me to be too late now to raise any contention on that subject. It was there held that a civil servant, covenanting with the East India Company and residing in India in the discharge of that contract, had sufficiently indicated his intention of establishing his domicile there, although, no doubt, he probably entertained the intention, more or less remote, of returning to the country of his birth. I do not think it necessary to enter at any length into the principle on which the combination of residence and intention—the factum and animus—are held to denote and determine a change of the domicile of origin. This principle has been considered of late in a great many instructive cases. It is enough that it has been conclusively held that service as a civilian with the East India Company, and continuous residence in that country, does obliterate the domicile of origin, and create what is called an Anglo-Indian domicile.

In the present case, the deceased Samuel Wauchope entered the East India Company's service as a civilian in the year 1841, and, with the exception of two short absences, he resided in India from 1842 to 1873, a period of thirty-one years. In 1858, more than fifteen years after Mr Wauchope had taken up his residence in India, the Act of that year was passed, transferring the functions of the East India directors and the government of the East Indian provinces to the Crown. It has been suggested in one or two recent cases that the decision in the case of Bruce proceeded on the fact that the East India Company was a trading company, and that service with it was equivalent to, if not identical with, service with a foreign Government; and that now that the service, whether in a civil or military capacity, in that country is service under the Crown, the principle of the judgment no longer applies.

I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on these doubts, excepting to say that I should be slow to hold that the coincidence of residence and intention on which the case of Bruce proceeded was in any degree altered by the transference of the government from the East India Company to the Crown. The Government took over the public obligations of the Company, and continued the services of those who had been previously employed by the Company on substantially the same terms. It is nearly twenty years since that transference was made, and, as far as I know, it has not as yet been found that any alteration on this question of domicile was thereby introduced.

But, however this question may be solved, it can have no application to the present case. There can be no doubt that Samuel Wauchope acquired an Indian domicile; the question is whether he has lost it, and as domicile can only lost by an intention to abandon it, accompanied by abandonment, I think it clear that no such elements are to be found in the present case. No. 147.

The second question raises some considerations of interest and novelty. It depends upon the terms of the Act of the Indian Council of 1865. This Act, which is in substance and effect a codification of the law of intestate and testamentary succession for British India, contains a series of legal definitions and propositions, accompanied with illustrations applicable to the subject-matter treated of. Among other propositions is this one—" (10) A man acquires a new domicile by taking up his fixed habitation in a country which is not that of his domicile of origin." Then follows these words—" Explanation.—A man is not to be considered as having taken up his fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in her Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling." It was maintained that these words of themselves had the effect of abrogating the Anglo-Indian domicile of Samuel Wauchope, and of reviving his domicile of origin. I cannot, however, read them as having any such effect. June 23, 1877.
Wauchope v.
Wauchope.

It is not necessary to dispute that, if by a law passed by competent authority a person resident in any country is declared not to be domiciled there, the provision must receive effect in whatever forum it is pleaded, for every country has the right of determining for itself under what circumstances a domicile within it shall be acquired; and if Mr Wauchope had continued to live in India under a law which enacted that he should not be domiciled there, it would have been very difficult to resist the conclusion that the intention to abandon the domicile of origin had ceased. It might be different if the law of the foreign country prescribed certain elements which should constitute a domicile within it. For in such a case it might quite well be that the forum in which the question was tried might, notwithstanding an international principle, apply its own law of domicile in any question occurring before it. But I imagine that no such conflict can arise in the present case, mainly because the words of this provision cannot, in my opinion, affect a domicile already acquired. Whatever be its true construction—and the words are far too popular and wanting in precision to make its interpretation altogether satisfactory—it is plain that the provision relates to the acquisition and not to the retention of a domicile. Indeed it is provided by No. 13 of the same code that a "new domicile continues until the former domicile has been acquired"—a proposition not very philosophically expressed, but in substance manifestly true. The existing domicile must continue until something has been done by the person leaving the domicile to abandon it in fact and in intention, and therefore, as the explanation adjoined article 10 only defines in what circumstances a man is not to be considered having acquired a new domicile and lost an old one, it cannot be applied to the case of a person who had already acquired an Indian domicile.

I think this sufficiently plain upon the words of the provision, and it would be contrary to all principles of legislation, and a most mischievous precedent, to apply these words inferentially to a case they do not express, and indeed exclude, and to give them a retrospective effect on the status, personal and domestic relations, deeds and conveyances, mortis causa as well as inter vivos, of all the civil servants in India at the date at which the Act passed. I am therefore of opinion that Mr Wauchope had acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile, and that he never lost it.

His Lordship then referred to the second and third questions.

No. 147.

June 28, 1877.
 Wauchope v.
 Wauchope.

LORD ORMDALE.—The first question to be answered is—"Was the domicile of the deceased Samuel Wauchope Scotch at the time of his death?"

After careful consideration I have come to be of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative. It is true that the late Mr Wauchope was born in Scotland, and therefore that his domicile of origin was Scotch. But in early life he went to India, where he entered the civil service of the East India Company, and continued in that country and service upwards of thirty years, during which time he visited Scotland twice on short leave and once on furlough.

Such being, generally, the state of matters, I think it so clear on the authorities, and especially the decision of this Court and the House of Lords in the well-known case of Bruces v. Bruce, in 1790 (Mor. 4617, 3 Pat. Appeals, 163) that it is impossible not to hold that the late Mr Wauchope, by entering and continuing in India in the service of the East India Company till 1858, when that company ceased to exist and its interests were transferred to the Crown, had then lost his domicile of origin and acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile.

It was contended, however, that the extinction of the East India Company in 1858, and the circumstance of the late Mr Wauchope becoming on that event a servant of the Crown, distinguishes the present case from that of Bruces v. Bruce, and renders the principle of the judgment in that case inapplicable. I am unable to think so. It is true that one of the reasons assigned for the judgment in Bruce's case was that the party whose domicile formed the subject of dispute was in the service of the company, and not in a British regiment which might have been in India only occasionally; but the position of the late Mr Wauchope was precisely of the same nature after as well as before 1858, when the East India Company ceased to exist and the Crown came into its place. It could no more be said of him, after his service was transferred to the Crown in 1858 than it could previously, that his service in India was only occasional. The reason and principle of the decision in the case of Bruces v. Bruce appears therefore, so far, to be clearly applicable to the present.

Neither can I see anything in the "Indian Succession Act, 1865," that can be held to affect the matter. The "explanation" which follows article 10 in that Act, to the effect that "a man is not to be considered as having taken up a fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in His Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling," appears to me to be no more than an announcement in a concentrated form of the settled law on the subject as exemplified by the case of Bruces v. Bruce, according to the terms of the judgment in that case, besides the circumstance of the party going to India and entering the service of the East India Company there were the further circumstances of his not having declared any fixed or settled intention of returning to Scotland to remain there.

If I am right in those views, it follows there is nothing in the present case to distinguish it from that of Bruces v. Bruce. In the present case it is no doubt the fact that the late Mr Wauchope was absent from India, and it may be said was in Scotland for a short time before his death, but he had not returned to the service in India, but, on the contrary, was in the receipt of furlough allowance down to his death. He had therefore kept up to the last his connection with India, and must, I think, be held to have intended to return there to resume the discharge of his active duties. And it does not appear that he ever declared his intention of ultimately and finally returning to Scotland.

LORD GIFFORD.—I assume that the information stated in this special case, No. 147, although I feel it to be very meagre, contains the whole facts now attainable by the parties material to the question at issue. Upon the facts so stated I am of opinion that the late Samuel Wauchope, at the time of his death on 23d July 1877, had an Anglo-Indian domicile, and that his succession must be regulated accordingly. June 23, 1877.
Wauchope v. Wauchope.

In the year 1841 Mr Wauchope, then only about nineteen years of age, entered the civil service of the East India Company, and in that service he next year went to British India. At that time the East India Company was a private company; its rights and interests were not transferred to or vested in the Crown till the statute of 1858.

Mr Wauchope appears to have entered the company's service in the usual way and on the usual terms. His appointment was of a permanent nature, and indefinite as to its duration. In point of fact that employment lasted till Mr Wauchope's death, being a period of about thirty-four years. He was in the same service at his death, although, as the rights and powers of the company had been transferred to her Majesty, he was at his death in the service of the Crown.

During that long period of service Mr Wauchope resided in British India, only visiting Scotland three times in all. He married in India in 1843, and he never took up any permanent domicile anywhere else. He died in Switzerland during an absence from his service, but he contemplated returning to it, for he was only absent from India on furlough, which had not expired at the time of his death.

I think it is fixed by the authorities referred to at the bar that a person acting permanent private employment in British India, and residing there in pursuance thereof, the employment being of indefinite duration, and involving continued residence in India, acquires an Anglo-Indian domicile, unless there be very strong circumstances and indications to the contrary. A mere indefinite intention ultimately to return to Scotland when a sufficient fortune is made, or adequate retiring pension is earned, will not per se prevent the acquisition of Anglo-Indian domicile. The present case is a stronger case than usual for finding that an Anglo-Indian domicile was acquired, for not only did Mr Wauchope marry and settle in India for thirty-four years, but he had no residence in Scotland, or anywhere else than in India, and he had no patrimonial estate or real estate of any kind in Scotland by means of which his connection with that country might be kept up.

From 1841 to 1858 the East India Company was just a private trading company with large possessions in India. If, then, Mr Wauchope had died previous to 1858, and before the East India Company and its whole interests were vested in the Crown, I think he must have been held a domiciled Anglo-Indian. I think this is the result of the authorities bearing on such a question, and to which your Lordships have referred. But it was contended that Mr Wauchope's becoming a servant of the Crown in 1858 raised a different presumption, at least from that which obtained before that date, and the Indian Succession Act of 1865 was strongly relied on, particularly the explanation annexed to section 10, which provides

“a man is not to be considered as having taken up his fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in her Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling.”

Now, if Mr Wauchope, instead of entering the service of the East India Com-

No. 147. pany in 1841, when it was a private company, had entered the Indian service of the Crown after 1858, and particularly if he had entered subsequent to the Indian Act of 1865, I think there would have been very strong grounds for maintaining that he had not thereby lost his Scotch domicile of origin, even although he remained in India for a very considerable time. At least in a case where the facts are so bare as those set forth in this joint case, and where there are no indications of change of domicile except the mere circumstance of residence and service, I think the abandonment of the domicile of origin would not thereby be presumed. But I cannot hold that the transference of British India to the Crown in 1858, even coupled with the Indian Act of 1865, had the effect of changing the legal domicile of all those who had gone out to India long before 1858, and who had, according to the then existing law, acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile prior to the change effected in 1858 and prior to the Indian Act of 1865. I do not think any such result can be ascribed either to the Vesting Act of 1858 or to the Indian Succession Act of 1865. It would require some very express and explicit enactment to produce an effect so startling as would be the change, whether inversion or reversion, of the legal domicile of the whole personnel then serving the East India Company in British India. I cannot give any such effect either to the transference of the East India Company to the Crown or to the Indian Succession Act of 1865.

I feel compelled, therefore, to decide the present case just as if it had arisen in 1858; and if I find upon the facts stated, as I do, that in 1858 Mr Wauchope was a domiciled Anglo-Indian, and if I find upon the facts stated, as I do, that nothing has occurred since 1858 whereby Mr Wauchope has lost his Anglo-Indian domicile and has acquired a new one, then I must conclude, as I do, that Mr Wauchope's domicile at his death was Anglo-Indian.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the late Samuel Wauchope's domicile was in British India; and therefore find unnecessary to answer the other questions, and decern: Allow the expenses incurred by both parties to this special case to be paid out of the estate."

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 148.

WILLIAM STEWART, Pursuer.—Asher—Lang.

THE COLTNESS IRON COMPANY AND ROBERT DEWAR, Defendants.—
Balfour—Alison.

June 23, 1877.
Stewart v.
Coltness Iron
Company and
Dewar.

Reparation—Liability of Master for Injury to Servant—Process—Release of Averment.—In an action at the instance of a miner against colliery proprietors and their manager for damages for personal injury alleged to have been incurred by the pursuer in consequence of the proprietors or their manager having negligently or culpably failed to properly support and prop the roof of the mine. The Court, on consideration of a proof, found that the pursuer having failed to prove fault on the part of the defenders, they were entitled to absolvitor.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk) upon the effect of the rules laid down in decided cases as to the liability of masters for the fault of their workmen.

Observations (per Lord Ormisdale) upon the relevancy of the pursuer's averments.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
R.

IN December 1876 William Stewart, miner, Maryhill, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to recover £500 in damages from the Coltness Iron Company, or Robert Dewar, manager of one of their pits, called the Polkemmet Pit. The pursuer's averments were:—(Cond. 1) "The said defenders ought to be decerned to pay him the sum of £500 sterling of principal, or such other principal sum as may seem just, as and being solatium to and reparation or compensation for personal suffering, loss, injury, and damages, sustained and to be sustained by the pursuer in the circumstances aftermentioned." (Cond. 2) "The defenders, or their managers, roadsmen, or other servants (whose names the pursuer does not know, but for whom the defenders are responsible), did on or about this date (July 17, 1875), and prior thereto, carelessly, recklessly, negligently, and culpably, and in violation of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 76, and relative special rules, and other statutes and rules, and of common law, fail to properly support and prop the roof of defenders' pit, known as Polkemmet Pit, in or near Fauldhouse, and to have an adequate supply of timber for props and other necessary purposes always ready at the place in said pit where the miners were, and particularly the pursuer was, on said date, at work, for the use of the miners in supporting the roofs and sides of their working places, all cut in proper lengths, and laid down at the working places." (Cond. 3) "In consequence of which culpable neglect and violation of and failure in duty, a large stone or part of the roof in foresaid pit, on foresaid specified date, fell on and crushed and injured the pursuer so as to render him unfit for work, and permanently disabled him, his spine or other part of his body being injured; and the pursuer at said time was earning 5s. sterling per day or thereby; and he not only suffered great pain and agony, but also damages to foresaid extent of principal."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) Damnum fatale. (2) The culpa or carelessness (if any such existed) occasioning said fall and the alleged injury having been on the part of a contractor, by whom the pursuer was employed, or on the part of a fellow-servant or fellow-servants with pursuer, in the employment of said contractor, or on the part of all or one or more of said parties, for none of whom the defenders were or are responsible, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) Or, alternatively with the second plea in law, the culpa or carelessness (if any such existed) occasioning said fall and the alleged injury having been on the part of a fellow-workman or workmen in the employment, along with pursuer, of the said Coltness Iron Company, and Thomas Houldsworth, J. H. Houldsworth, and J. M. Houldsworth, defenders, for none of whom defenders were or are responsible, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. And (4) Contributory negligence.

A proof having been allowed to both parties evidence of a most conflicting nature was led as to whether prop-wood had been supplied in the pit in sufficient quantities, and as to whether complaints of a want of wood had ever been made to the manager or any of the responsible men in charge of the pit.

On 24th May 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) assolized the defenders.

Stewart appealed, and on 29th December the Sheriff-principal (Clark) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that on or about the occasion libelled the pursuer, while working in the employment of the defenders, the Coltness Iron Company, and whose manager the other defender was, received severe and permanent injuries in consequence of the falling upon him of a large stone from the roof of the workings by and through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, in respect that a sufficient supply of prop-wood was not afforded to him at the working where he was employed:

No. 148.

June 23, 1877.
Stewart v.
Coltness Iron
Company and
Dewar.

No. 148. Therefore finds the defenders liable in damages, and assesses the same at £100," &c.

June 23, 1877.
Stewart v.
Coltness Iron
Company and
Dewar.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.
At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—This is an action at the instance of William Stewart, a miner, against the Coltness Iron Company, and their manager Dewar, in whose works at Polkemmet Pit he was employed in July 1876, and there received serious bodily injury by the fall of a stone upon him from the roof of the pit. The pursuer concludes for £500 as damages in respect of that injury.

The Sheriff-substitute assailed the defenders, but the Sheriff-principal altered and found them liable in £100 of damages.

The averments of the pursuer appear to me to be very peculiar, and after the numerous authoritative decisions which have been pronounced in regard to such actions I am surprised that these averments were sustained as relevant, or were ever remitted to probation.

The first article of the condescendence amounts to little more than that the defenders are, in the circumstances, liable to the pursuer in payment of £500. The second article is to the effect that "the defenders, or their managers, roadmen, or other servants (whose names the pursuer does not know, but for whom the defenders are responsible), . . . carelessly, recklessly, negligently, and culpably," &c., failed to prop the roof of the pit, or to supply wood for that purpose. And the third article bears that in consequence of that failure of duty the accident happened, and the pursuer was injured. Now, that appears to me to be a very loose and unsatisfactory statement. It does not condescend on any particular individual, or set of individuals, who are assumed to be responsible. It merely refers generally to the company and all their servants, without specifying or naming any of them. This mode of libelling his case was very disadvantageous to the pursuer himself, for it led to a vague and rambling proof, from which it is impossible to extract anything definite and certain. It also placed the defenders in a most embarrassing position, as they had no proper notice of the case which was to be made against them. The averment was simply that the Coltness Company, or some of their employees, with whose names the pursuer was unacquainted, were liable to him in damages in respect of the injury he had sustained.

Ever since the Bartonhill cases, 3 Macq. 266, and the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, as decided in the House of Lords, 6 Macph. H.L. 84, it has been held as settled that the owners of pits are not responsible for injuries sustained by the miners in their employment through the fault of their fellow-workmen, including the manager, engaged in the same common employment; and it is indeed impossible to understand, as has been frequently remarked by the most eminent lawyers, in the House of Lords as well as inferior Courts, both in England and Scotland, how large industrial works could be carried on upon any other footing. In the general case it is out of the question to expect personal superintendence by owners of such establishments. All that can be expected is that they appoint proper and competent managers and others to direct and superintend and carry out the operations. Accordingly, in actions against owners or employers, where personal fault is intended to be charged, that must be distinctly averred and proved. Or they may be made responsible for the fault of their employees, when it is averred.

oved that these persons were not competent or fit for their respective duties. No. 148.
 at there is no such averment in the record in this case, and no attempt appears have been made by the pursuer to prove incompetency on the part of any one the pit. The contrary, indeed, has been proved by the defenders. Nor has y other fault been brought home to the Coltness Company, or any of its rners.

June 23, 1877.
 Stewart v.
 Coltness Iron
 Company and
 Dewar.

Again, as to the other defender Dewar, the manager, the record and proof pear to me to be also quite insufficient. In particular, it is not said or proved it was through his personal fault the accident happened. The effect of the idence as a whole on my mind is that not only Dewar, the manager, but also the other head persons in the pit, were quite competent and fit for their ties, and cannot be fairly charged with personal fault. I have therefore no itation in saying that, in my opinion, no case has, on any ordinary ground liability, been established against the defenders.

A special point, however, was attempted to be made by the pursuer, to the et that the company failed to supply prop-wood, or to have it ready at suite places in the pit, and that on this ground they are responsible to the pur-
 r. This might have been a ground of liability if satisfactorily averred and ved. But I am clearly of opinion that no such case has been established.
 the contrary, there is ample proof, I think, that there was a plentiful supply wood. Whether the wood was always brought to the proper places in the pit the persons whose duty it was to attend to that matter is another thing.
 e company, however, having supplied plenty of wood, no case can be mained against them on that point. And if the wood, being supplied, was not ried to and laid down in suitable places in the pit, that must have been the lt, not of the company, but of others employed in the pit. But the pursuer not shewn that Dewar, the only defender besides the company, was in fault that respect.

It was farther argued, however, as against Dewar, that he was liable on the und that he had systematically neglected the duties incumbent upon him by rules of the pit. I cannot, however, see how this has been made out. The nd of the special rules by which the pit was regulated defines the duties of anager. But it is clear that the manager could not possibly be everywhere nce, so as personally to see if the roof was safe, or that every miner had sup-d himself with the necessary prop-wood. That cannot, I think, be said to the manager's duty within the meaning of this rule, especially when we have rd to the other rules, and to the duties thereby imposed upon the oversman e 7),¹ roadsman (rule 28), and fireman (rule 40). Keeping these rules in r, and also the 59th, 60th, and 61st rules, which relate to the duties of the ers themselves, it becomes obvious that the manager's duty is and can be hing more than general superintendence. And it is also clear, I think, from rules, that it is the duty of the miners themselves to be careful for their own ty; but I rather think it is proved that the pursuer did not in this respect form himself to the rules.

For those reasons, I am very clearly of opinion that the pursuer has entirely al to establish his case, and therefore that the judgment appealed against ht to be reversed.

¹ See supra, p. 472, note.

No. 148.

June 23, 1877.
Stewart v.
Coltness Iron
Company and
Dewar.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in the conclusion to which he has come, that "it is not proved that the accident was due to any fault on the part of either of the defenders," by this, I mean, personal or individual fault of the defenders, or of some of them, and the failure to bring home personal or individual fault leads to decree of absolvitur in favour of both defenders, because fault must be brought home to them before they can be made liable. The present is not a case where a stranger to the colliery is injured by the negligence of the servants or workmen of the mine-owner, and hence there is here no constructive liability of the defenders for the acts of their servants.

In the first place, and with respect to the case against the company and individual partners thereof, there is no averment far less proof that any of the partners failed in any duty which they undertook. For example, it is not said that the oversman or manager appointed by them was unfit for their duty, or that the company failed to appoint officers at all. On the face of it, therefore, the case against the company and its partners falls to be dismissed.

The only case which, with any plausibility or relevancy, it has been attempted to make out is that against the manager of the company personally, for he is charged with having neglected to provide prop-wood at proper places throughout the mine. Now, that is a relevant complaint, and, if proved, would infer liability. But the pursuer has failed to bring it home to the manager. It is in evidence that there was plenty of prop-wood at the pit-head, at the pit-bottom, and also in some of the roads. The complaint made is that it was not at the working faces. But it was not the personal duty of the manager to convey the prop-wood from the proper stores or deposits thereof to the working faces. The manager can only be made responsible for that if the complaint is made to him, and if he knew that those whose duty it was to bring forward the wood to the working faces had failed or refused to do so. But there is no evidence to this effect. No one has proved or even suggested that he complained to the manager that he could not get prop-wood at his working face. No one has said that the manager knew or ever had any reason to suspect that the rules of the pit were being violated, and although there was plenty of prop-wood it was not taken forward so as to be handy for use.

The case of the pursuer, however, fails still more completely on this point when we consider the special rules as to bringing forward the prop-wood, for by the special rules the drawers are bound to convey the prop-wood to the working face, and not a single drawer was called to prove that he could get no wood. That is fatal to the case. The drawers are generally the private assistants of the miners, and paid by the miners themselves to take the coal to the pit-bottom, and if prop-wood is wanted to bring it back to the face in the empty hutches. The miner has himself to blame if he does not make his drawer bring what he requires. Still further, it was plainly the duty of the miners, if they could not get prop-wood, to stop working. They would be entitled to the same wages all the same, but they were not bound to go on working in a pit which was unsafe from want of propping. In every point of view, therefore, I think the pursuer's case has entirely failed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not differ from the proposed judgment.

But for the series of decisions relative to the conditions which are implied in every contract of service I should have been inclined to hold that in so far as these regulations related to matters in which any individual servant had an interest, they constituted the counterpart of the obligations incumbent on the servant, and were things which the master by himself or his servants undertook to do as his part of the contract. It would not have occurred to me that it made the slightest difference whether the work was a large or a small one, or whether the master was or was not expected to do these things personally. But has now been conclusively fixed that the obligation incurred by the master under such a contract is one of an entirely different description, namely, to appoint competent servants to discharge these duties; and that there was no obligation whatever to supply these miners with prop-wood on the part of the duly persons with whom the pursuer contracted, so that, as the law now stands, the miner is bound to work, and the master is not bound to supply him with the necessary materials to enable him to work in safety, but only to appoint persons fairly competent to do so.

But then it is said, this duty is placed on others, with whom the miner has a contract, and that his remedy lies against them. The present case is not a practical example of the security thereby afforded—if the defenders' argument be sound. The manager throws it on the oversman, the oversman on the man, the fireman on the drawer, until, however gross or glaring the neglect, is impossible to fix liability on any one. It comes to this, according to the defenders, that no one contracted with the miner to give him prop-wood; that there were persons who had undertaken to do this by a separate contract with another; but that who these persons are it is impossible to say.

This is the result of the decisions; and they are quite conclusive on the present case so far as the Coltness Company is concerned. The company never undertook to furnish the pursuer with prop-wood, and, therefore, cannot be responsible for not having furnished it; and, as far as they are concerned, they must be assolizied, if the servants appointed were competent, and there is no proof that they were not.

The case against the manager stands somewhat differently. If I were to hold proved that prop-wood was not duly supplied I have no doubt whatever that prima facie at least the manager is responsible, and must discharge himself. If the manager's obligation comes in place of that of the master it must be read as part of the conditions of the service. Now, the manager was bound to see that prop-wood was supplied to the miners—not to do it himself, but to see it done. This is plain from regulation No. 2. It was therefore for the manager to shew that this duty was performed, and, on that matter, I should have had no doubt, had it been proved, as it lay on the pursuer to prove, that the prop-wood was supplied. But the evidence on this head is so conflicting that, rather reluctantly, I am obliged to concur in the judgment, although remaining under the impression that the regulations were most imperfectly carried out in the work.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the respondent (pursuer) has failed to prove that the injury libelled was occasioned by the fault of any of the appellants (defenders): Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment appealed against, and assolzie the appellants (defenders) from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the respondent liable in expenses to the appellants in both Courts, and remit."

No. 149.

WILLIAM TAYLOR KEITH, Pursuer and Respondent.—*Naray.*GEORGE OUTRAM AND COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Asher—Lang

June 27, 1877.

Keith v.

Outram & Co.

Process—Expenses—Amendment of Record—Court of Session Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 29.—An action of damages for slander contained in a newspaper article was appealed by the defenders from the Sheriff Court for jury trial. An issue was adjusted, and notice of trial was given. The defenders then proposed to amend the record, by adding an averment and plea of veritas. Amendment and counter issue allowed, on condition of the defenders paying the whole expenses of the pursuer since the closing of the record in the Sheriff Court.

1st DIVISION.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

M.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire brought by William Taylor Keith against George Outram and Company, printers and publishers of the "Glasgow Herald" newspaper, concluding for damages for slander alleged to be contained in a newspaper article.

The defenders pleaded privilege, but no averment or plea of veritas was stated.

The record was closed by the Sheriff-substitute on 17th January 1877 and the defenders appealed for jury trial.

On 3d March this issue was adjusted:—"It being also admitted that the said article or words are of and concerning the pursuer, Whether the said article falsely and calumniously represents to the public that the pursuer was a swindler, and a person guilty of fraudulent and dishonest practice to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

Notice of trial was given for the summer sittings.

The defenders then proposed to amend their statement of facts and plea in law by adding an averment that the statements contained in the newspaper article complained of were true, and by giving a more detailed narrative than was contained in the original defences of the actings of the pursuer to which the article referred.

The defenders maintained that the amendment was competent,¹ and that they were also entitled to a counter issue of veritas.

The pursuer contended that the amendment raised a new question which was not raised by the original record, and was not competent.

The defenders then lodged this counter issue:—"Whether the statements contained in the said article are true?"

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are all of opinion that this amendment is competent but it is necessary that an issue should be put in. That should have been done when the amendment was lodged.

But there are some important conditions on which alone we can allow the amendment. This defence, like all other defences, ought to have been stated when the defenders came into Court. That is the rule both in this Court and in the inferior Courts. I can conceive that amendments may be added to the record by a defender at a late stage which do not involve any great hardship to the pursuer, and where no large award of expenses would be necessary as a condition to their being allowed. But this defence belongs to a different class. If the defenders had stated this defence when they ought to have done so it would then have been for the pursuer to consider whether he would go on with the case. Now that the amendment is allowed that will be a matter for his conderation. It is the duty of the Court, when an amendment is allowed, to place the pursuer in the same position as if the defence had been stated at the proper time. The only expense then incurred was the expense of bringing the action to Court, and the pursuer might have abandoned the action then on paying the defenders' expenses. All that he has since done may be thrown away if he is now induced to abandon the action.

¹ Gelot v. Stewart, March 4, 1870, 8 Macph. 649, 42 Scot. Jur. 321; Armstrong v. Burt, Nov. 14, 1872, 11 Macph. 62, 45 Scot. Jur. 46.

No. 149.
June 27, 1877.
Keith v.
Outram & Co.

This rule is not confined to this defence, but to all defences which put it upon the pursuer to consider whether or not he will go on with his action. When the Court allow such an amendment the payment of all expenses incurred since the defence ought to have been stated must be imposed upon the defender. At the same time, the particular circumstances of any case will always fall to be taken into consideration.

LORD DEAR.—This action was raised in the inferior Court, and concluded for damages on account of an alleged libel, published in the "Glasgow Herald" newspaper, the innuendo being that the pursuer was thereby represented as a swindler and a person guilty of fraudulent and dishonest practices. In defence the defenders stated that they had given an accurate report of a criminal charge, made by the public prosecutor against the pursuer. They farther alleged that they had a probable cause for their comments on the subject, but they did not undertake to prove the veritas. This they now propose to do, by amending the record by taking a counter issue upon the veritas. The question is on what condition the amendment is to be allowed? In other circumstances payment of expenses since the making of the record might be sufficient. But if the veritas had been pleaded at the outset the pursuer, who knows the whole facts best, would have had an opportunity of considering whether he would persevere with his action. I think that in that state of matters he should have expenses from the outset.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"On condition of the defenders paying to the pursuer the whole expenses incurred by him in both Courts since 17th January last, allow the defences, No. 6 of process, to be amended in terms of the said proposed amendment, and the counter issue, also now proposed by the defenders, to be added to the issue for the pursuer, adjusted and settled on the 3d March last, No. 13 of process: Appoint the said issue for the pursuer and counter issue for the defenders to be the issues for the trial of the cause: Of consent appoint the cause to be tried at the ensuing sittings of this Division of the Court; and remit to the Auditor to tax the account of the foresaid expenses incurred by the pursuer, and to report."

WILLIAM ROSS GARSON, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 150. WM. ROSS ROBERTSON AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Asher—McKechnie.
WM. RAMSAY AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Nevey—J. A. Reid.

June 29, 1877.
Robertson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

Agent and Client—Account—Fees for Drawing a Bond with a Heritable Security—Consideration.—Persons in prosecuting a claim to an estate obtained an advance of £2000, on granting in return a personal bond binding themselves to pay £10,000 in the event of success, and a heritable security for £10,000 over the estate. Held that the rate of charge by the agent for preparing these deeds was to be regulated by the consideration given and not by the amount which the claimants would have to pay in the event of their establishing their right to the estate.

1st Division.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

THIS was an action by Andrew Ross Robertson, with consent of Mr Jane Ross or Macpherson, his aunt, against William Ramsay and the trustees of the late Matthew Walker, as representing the late firm of Walker and Ramsay, writers in Glasgow, concluding for repayment of an alleged overcharge in a business account of Messrs Walker and Ramsay. The following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note :—"In February 1876 the pursuer, along with Mrs Macpherson, entered into a transaction with Mr Henry Leck, whereby, for the consideration of £2000, they granted to him a bond* for £10,000, payable in the event of the succeeding to the Shandwick estates," (which were then the subject of litigation). "They further granted a disposition of these estates in favour of Mr Leck; and, on the other hand, he gave them a back-letter acknowledging that the disposition was granted, inter alia, in security of the bond. The defenders acted as the agents for both parties in carrying out this transaction.

"The defenders in settling with the pursuer accepted £90 in payment of their account. The account as made up amounted to £100, 14s. 6d. but they give a discount of £10, 14s. 6d. The principle on which the account was framed was to charge the expense of the transaction against the pursuer and Mrs Macpherson as if they were the borrowers of £10,000, according to the rule that the borrower pays the expense of the loan.

"The Lord Ordinary remitted the account to Mr Baxter, the Auditor of the Court, for his report, and he has reported that the fees of the agents should be regulated by the consideration in respect of which the bond was granted."

The account included an item "drawing bond for £10,000 to Henry Leck, Esq., £73, 10s.," and from this the Auditor struck off £56. There were other small items struck off, leaving an overcharge of £60, 14s. 6d. but as a discount of £10, 14s. 6d. had been allowed at the settlement the overcharge amounted to £50.†

* The bond bore :—"In consideration of the sum of £2000 sterling paid us by Henry Leck, accountant in Glasgow, we do hereby bind and oblige ourselves jointly and severally, and our several respective heirs, executors, and successors without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to make payment to said Henry Leck and his heirs and executors, or assignees, of the sum of £10,000 sterling, and that so soon as and at the date that we or either of us shall succeed to the said estate of Shandwick, in the county of Ross, with a fifth part more of the foresaid principal sum of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and the interest of said principal sum of £10,000 sterling at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the date of said succession until paid."

† In the joint table of fees adjusted by the Societies of Writers to the Signet and S.S.C., and the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow, for transactions after 1st January 1876, under the head "Fees for documents and agency according

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that they were entitled to absolvitor, No. 150. with expenses, in respect (2) that the pursuer could not sue for repetition of sums paid by him for professional services in the full knowledge of the premises; and (3) that the sums paid by the pursuer were justly due when paid.

June 29, 1877.
Robertson, &c.
v. Ramsay, &c.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders for the sum of £50 sterling, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from 26th February 1876 till payment: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question was whether the security was for £10,000 or £2000. Mr Leck never was to receive £2000, but hoped to receive £10,000. This was the sum which he wished to have heritably secured, and it was this sum for which the agents undertook responsibility. The agent's responsibility was what regulated the rate of charge.

Argued for the pursuer;—The transaction was not properly a loan, but the purchase of a contingent interest in the success of a litigation. The due of the interest was the sum paid for it, viz., £2000, and that ought regulate the agent's charge.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not now said that the pursuer in this action is too late bringing his claim, and the question is whether the account is overcharged. In order to determine whether there is an overcharge or not it is necessary to examine the nature of the transaction which Messrs Walker and Ramsay were employed to carry through. A Mr Leck advanced to the pursuer the sum of £2000, and in return he obtained a personal bond for the sum of £10,000, and a heritable security consisting of an absolute disposition and back-letter of one-half pro indiviso of the estate of Shandwick. Mr Robertson Ross, and his aunt's Macpherson, were claimants to the estate of Shandwick as the nearest heirs-portioners of the last heir in possession of that estate, and it was in expectation of their success in that claim that this money was advanced. What Mr Leck obtained in return was the chance of obtaining a sum five times as large as what he gave, in the event of the success of the claim. There is no need to advert to the nature of the heritable security.

The account before us is charged on the footing that the matter to be dealt with was a personal bond with a heritable security for £10,000, and if that be the right view of it an ad valorem fee, which is the charge made, is the proper charge.

The Lord Ordinary made a remit to the Auditor of Court, and has now reported the view reported to him, that the transaction was not one of loan, but purchase, and that Mr Leck bought from the pursuer and his aunt a chance of obtaining £10,000 for a present payment of £2000. I confess I do not care what the nature of the transaction is. It must be either a loan or a sale, or it is a legitimate transaction at all. I may say it appears to me to look like a bet, and perhaps that is another aspect of it. I am very clearly rice or value," the ad valorem fees (scale I.) are thus stated—"Charge. Price exceeding £500;—for each £100, £1, 1s. Above £500—the above rate for the first £500, and for each additional £100,—10s. 6d." Under this scale fall deeds and dispositions in security Deeds constituting burdens When the agents act for both parties the one-half of the ad valorem fee is allowed in addition."

No. 150. of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that according to the rule in the table

June 29, 1877. of fees now in use the consideration is the proper sum upon which to charge Robertson, &c. the valorem fee.

v. Ramsay, &c. It was very ingeniously argued that the responsibility of the agents was not limited to £2000, but that it might amount to £10,000. There would be a great deal of force in that contention if the holder of the bond were secured with what would at some future date for certain be worth £10,000. But here the chance, depending on the result of a litigation, was all the lender got, and although the agent's liability might be for £10,000, yet in another view it might be nil, so that the consideration given must be the measure of the rate of the agent's remuneration. If it was a fair transaction that was the value of the right which the lender acquired. I therefore see no reason to doubt that the conclusion to which the Auditor and the Lord Ordinary have come is quite right.

I do not, however, intend to express any opinion upon the amount of the agent's responsibility.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

A. NIVISON, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 151.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

COLIN LYON MACKENZIE, Pursuer.—Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.
JAMES THOMSON GIBSON-CRAIG AND OTHERS (Mackenzie's Trustees).
Defenders.—Rutherford.
MISS HELEN LYON MACKENZIE AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Rutherford.
COLIN LYON MACKENZIE JUNIOR, Defender.—Moncreiff—Keir.

Succession—Heir of Entail—Next of Kin—Accumulations—Thellusson Act 1800 (39 and 40 Geo. III., c. 98).—The granter of a trust-disposition, on the supposition that he had executed an entail of an estate, directed his trustees to lay out the residue of the trust-funds in the purchase of land near the entailed estate as soon as a favourable opportunity occurred, and to entail the land so purchased on the heir of entail in possession of the estate, and to pay to him three-fourths of the interest or profits of the residue until a purchase could be made, the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of the disposable fund. The trustees did not purchase any lands under this direction for thirty-four years after the truster's death. In an action of declarator afterwards raised by the heir of entail in possession against the trustees and the truster's next of kin he asked (1) that the Thellusson Act applied to the accumulations so made by the trustees after the lapse of twenty-one years from the truster's death; and (2) (dec. by Lord Deas, rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the person entitled to the accumulations under the Act as the person "who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed" was the heir of entail, who would have been entitled to the rents if the lands had been purchased, and not the truster's next of kin.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

THE late Colin Mackenzie of Newhall, who died on 1st October 1844, left a trust-settlement, which proceeded on the following narrative:—"Considering that I have, of the date of these presents, executed a deed of entail of my lands of Drumendden and Easter St. Martins, in the counties of Ross and Cromarty, in favour of my nephew, Colin Mackenzie, merchant in Inverness, and the heirs-male of his body, whom I have named the other heirs of tailie therein specified, and that it is my desire and intention that the said entailed estates shall not only be freed and relieved of all debts and burdens, but that the same shall be increased by new purchases from my free means and estate after the several other purposes aftermentioned shall be fulfilled." The deed then conveyed the whole of his property, which consisted only of moveables, to Mr James T. Gibson-Craig and others as trustees, who were directed, after paying certain legacies and annuities, "to lay out and invest the whole free proceeds of my trust-estate, with the interest which may accrue thereon (subject to the explanations underwritten), in the purchase of lands and estates as near to the foresaid lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden as they can conveniently be had, and shall afterwards settle and secure the lands and estates so to be purchased by a valid and formal deed or deeds of entail upon the same series of heirs (so far as then subsisting), and under the same provisions, limitations, restrictions, clauses irritant and resolutive, and other clauses, as are contained in the foresaid deed of entail executed by me; . . . declaring, in explanation of the foregoing appointment to invest the free proceeds and interest accruing thereon, that purchases may be made by my said trustees from time to time as they may judge most eligible, according to the state of the trusts and the opportunities which may offer of making suitable and convenient purchases, and that they shall not be bound to wait till the whole of the foregoing other purposes are fulfilled before making their first purchases, but that, so soon as they shall at any time have realised any free disposable sum or sums of money and a favourable opportunity of making a purchase or purchases shall occur, the same may immediately be so applied from time to time, but no purchase shall be made with any sum or sums of money necessary to be retained for answering any of the foregoing purposes till such purposes are completely fulfilled; and likewise declaring that when any purchase shall be made the free rents and profits of the lands so purchased, after the deducting public burdens and expense of collection, shall be payable by my said trustees to the heir of entail in possession for the time of the said entailed estates of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden; and further declaring, that in the event of any free disposable sum or sums of money being at any time realised, and no opportunity of making an eligible purchase occurring at the time, my said trustees shall be bound to make payment to the heir in possession of the said entailed estates of three-fourths of the free interest or profits of such disposable sum or sums of money until a purchase shall be made, the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of disposable funds, but the amount of the said three-fourths shall be fixed and determined periodically by my said trustees themselves, and their statement thereof shall be final and conclusive against the said heir of entail and all other persons in his right."

The trustees paid the legacies and fulfilled the purposes of the trust. They paid to the heir in possession of the estate of St Martins and Drumcudden three-fourths of the interest of the funds in their hands, retaining one-fourth as part of the capital to be invested in land in terms of the settlement.

On 13th December 1876 the heir of entail in possession of the estates Easter St Martins and Drumcudden, Colin Lyon Mackenzie, brought action against (1) the trustees, (2) Miss Helen Mackenzie and certain other persons, as representing the next of kin of the late Colin Mackenzie of Newhall, and (3) the pursuer's son, Colin Lyon Mackenzie junior, as next heir of entail to Easter St Martins and Drumcudden, concurring for a declarator that the direction that one-fourth of the interest should be applied to increase the free disposable sum or sums of money "

No. 151.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

No. 151. was null and void under the Thellusson Act.* There were also conclusions for payment.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded ;—The directions in the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement to accumulate the said surplus or one-fourth part of the free interest or profits of the said disposable sum or sums of money, being contrary to the provisions of the Act labelled, the same are null and void, from and since the expiry of twenty-one years from the date of the death of the testator ; and the pursuer being the person who would, but for the direction to make the said accumulations, have been entitled thereto, is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Miss Helen Mackenzie and others, as representing the next of kin, pleaded ;—The trust-funds accumulated subsequent to 1st October 1863 are intestate succession of the said Colin Mackenzie, and as such fall to be divided among the representatives of his next of kin as at the date of his death in 1842.

Colin Lyon Mackenzie junior, as heir next entitled to succeed to the estates of Drumcudden and Easter St Martins, lodged defences, and pleaded ;—(1) The claims of the pursuer are not, in the circumstances stated, maintainable with reference to the terms of the Thellusson Act and the trust-deed of the late Colin Mackenzie. (2) The pursuer having acquiesced in the trustees' administration under the said deed, and received payment in terms thereof of three-fourths of the free interest or profits realised since 1st October 1863, is barred from insisting in his present claim, and the interest or surplus profits so accumulated fall to be invested forthwith along with the funds from which they are derived in the purchase of lands to be entailed, as directed by the trust-deed of the late Colin Mackenzie.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor assailing the defences.†

* By the Act 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98, entitled "An Act to restrain Trusts and Directions in Deeds or Wills, whereby the profits or produce of Real or Personal Estate shall be accumulated, and the beneficial enjoyment thereof postponed beyond the time therein limited," it is enacted, "That no persons shall, after the passing of this Act (28th July 1800), by any deed, deeds, surrender or surrenders, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle, dispose of any real or personal property, so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term than the life or lives of any such granter or granters, settlor or settlers, or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such granter, settlor, deviser, or testator, . . . and in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this Act, go to and be received by such persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

† "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the Thellusson Act applies. There is no allegation that the trustees have not acted in conformity with the trust, and the accumulations are the result of a direction to accumulate, express or implied, contained in the trust-deed.

"The question remains, who is entitled to the accumulations? They are claimed by the pursuer as the person who would be entitled thereto if the accumulations had not been directed.

"The pursuer is the heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden. The trustees are directed to employ the trust-funds in the purchase of lands and estates as near to St Martins and Drumcudden as they can conveniently be had, and thereafter to settle them by a deed of entail on the same series of heirs, so far as then subsisting, as is contained

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Thellusson Act applied to the accumulations. The test whether the Act applied or not was not the object of the maker of the deed but the result of the deed. If the accumulations arose in the fair administration of the trust that was enough to make the Act apply to the case. (2) The accumulations should go to the person who would have got the money if there had been no direction to accumulate. If there had been no direction to accumulate the interest and profits would have gone along with the three-fourths of the residue to the pursuer as heir of entail in possession of the estate. The leading intention of the truster was that this fund should benefit the heir of entail, who was to get the lands. If he was to get the lands he was entitled to the interest of the fund on the principle that the person who was entitled to get the fee was entitled to get the income.¹

No. 151.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

Argued for the representatives of the testator's next of kin, Miss Helen Lyon Mackenzie and others;—There was here a direction to accumulate one-fourth of the income of the residue of the trust-estate for an indefinite period. This was struck at by the Thellusson Act, so far as it implied accumulations after twenty-one years from the testator's death, and there having been to that extent a failure of the purposes of the trust these accumulations being undisposed of by the deed became intestate succession.² The Court was not at liberty to speculate as to what might have the entail in which St Martins and Drumcudden are held. The trust-deed declares that when any purchase is made the rents and profits of the lands shall be payable to the heir in possession for the time of the estates of St Martins and Drumcudden, and that, until the purchase, the heir in possession of the estates shall be entitled to three-fourths of the interest of the trust-funds and accumulations. The truster therefore provides by express direction for the event which has happened, of no purchase being made. Till the purchase is made three-fourths of the income of the trust-funds is payable to the heir in possession of St Martins and Drumcudden. The remainder is to be accumulated, and it is only when lands are bought that the full income becomes payable to the heir in possession for the time.

“Under the trust-deed, therefore, the pursuer cannot claim more than three-fourths of the income of the trust funds. But he contends, that as the direction to accumulate is illegal, he is in the same position as if the truster had simply directed the lands to be purchased and settled on him as the institute of entail, that, on the principle of Lord Stair's case, he is entitled to the income of the trust-funds until the lands are bought. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, this argument is not well founded. The trust-deed in this case fixes the interest to the heirs of entail until the lands are purchased, and there is no room for the assumption on which the case of Lord Stair proceeded. Hence the Lord Ordinary conceives that the pursuer cannot claim the accumulations. He cannot do so under the trust-deed, and he has no other right. It seems to the Lord Ordinary that the accumulations are to be dealt with as intestate succession, on the principles recognised in the cases of Lord Keith's Trustees, and Lord v. Colvin. There is no disposal of residue into which would fall any bequests which failed, in whatever cause.”

Lord Stair v. Stair's Trs., Feb. 21, 1826, 4 S. 488, May 24, 1826, 2 W. and 414; Howat v. Howat's Trs., Feb. 17, 1838, 16 S. 622, 10 Scot. Jur. 312; Campbell's Trs. v. Campbell, June 30, 1838, 16 S. 1251; Dickson's Trs. v. Scott, v. 2, 1853, 16 D. 1, 26 Scot. Jur. 16; Moncreiff v. Menzies, Nov. 25, 1857, D. 94, 30 Scot. Jur. 59; Ogilvie v. Kirk-Session of Dundee, July 18, 1846, D. 1229; Combe v. Hughes, May 3, 1865, 34 L. J., Ch. 344; Ferrier v. Glasgow, Jan. 21, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 396.

Keith's Trustees, July, 17, 1857, 19 D. 1040, 29 Scot. Jur. 497; Lord v. Colvin, July 15, 1865, 3 Macph. 1083, 37 Scot. Jur. 568; Green v. Gascogyn, L. J., Ch. 268.

No. 151.
 June 29, 1877.
 Mackenzie v.
 Mackenzie's
 Trustees.

been the intention of the testator had he foreseen that the direction to accumulate would to a certain extent become imperative. The right of the testator's next of kin could only be defeated by a conveyance in favour of some one else, and there was no such conveyance in the deed. The case was therefore to be distinguished from Ogilvie v. Kirk-Session of Dundee, where there was the appointment of a residuary legatee, and also from Combe v. Hughes, where the direction was to accumulate the interest of a share of the residue which by a prior part of the deed was bequeathed to the testator's daughter, who was held entitled to the accumulations.

Argued for the defender, Colin Lyon Mackenzie junior, the next heir of entail;—The Thellusson Act did not apply, because there was no express or implied direction to accumulate in the deed. The trustees might have purchased land and conveyed it to the heir of entail soon after the truster's death. It was only by the acquiescence of the heir that the accumulations were allowed. As the accumulation had been made the funds ought to go according to the testator's direction. Therefore the trustees were bound to invest them in land.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question here is, whether under the Thellusson Act the accumulation directed in the trust-deed of the late Mr Mackenzie of Newhall, dated 1st August 1838, is not illegal after twenty-one years from the death of the testator, i.e., since 1863, Mr Mackenzie having died in 1842? I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that the Thellusson Act does apply, and that the accumulations since 1863 are in violation of the Act.

The question now comes to be, what is to be done with the profits so accumulated, and that depends on the words of the Act itself, which provides for that event thus,—“ In every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this Act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed.” The question we have to solve is who is the person who would have been entitled to the interest or profits if they had not been directed to be accumulated? On the one hand, it is maintained that the interest or profits so directed to be accumulated become intestate on the death of the testator. On the other hand, the pursuer maintains that they belong to him because if there had been no direction to accumulate he would have been entitled to them under the trust-deed.

I am of opinion that this latter contention is right, and I differ from the Lord Ordinary. I think that the pursuer is the person who would have been entitled to the interest if there had been no direction to accumulate. Observe what the capital sum is. It is money which the trustees are to invest in land, to be entailed on the pursuer as institute, and the heirs of his body afterwards. If there had been no direction as to the disposal of the income during the period which elapsed before the purchase of land was made it cannot be doubted that the income would have gone to the pursuer. That is the inevitable result of the case of Lord Stair and the cases which followed on it. The same view of the rights of an institute of entail may be illustrated by reference to the provisions of the Entail Amendment Act. If the heir in possession had been in a position to disentail his lands he might equally have disentailed this very money which has produced the rents and profits. That shews that, subject to the conditions of the existing entail, the pursuer is absolute owner of the money and of the No. 151.

entailed lands. He is no more limited as to the money than as to the land.

The ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that this is not the ordinary June 29, 1877.
case of a direction to purchase land without any provision as to what is to be Mackenzie v.
done with the money in the meantime. After the lands are purchased the rents Mackenzie's are to go to the heir of entail in possession of Easter St Martins and Druncudden, Trustees.
but before that only three-fourths are to go to the heir and one-fourth is to be accumulated. Does that make any difference? I do not think it does. He restricts the right of the heir of entail to three-fourths, in order to enable the trustees to accumulate one-fourth. It is the same thing as if he had directed the whole to be accumulated. The accumulations, being illegal, go to the party who, but for the direction to accumulate, would have been entitled to get them, and he is the heir of entail under the provisions of the trust-deed. This is quite settled by the case of Ogilvie's Trustees v. Kirk-Session of Dundee, 8 D. 1229, in the Court of Session, and by the case of Combe v. Hughes, 34 L. J. Chan. 344, in England. The principle is laid down with great accuracy and precision also in the case of Lord v. Colvin, 23 D. 111, and 3 Macph. 1083. It seems quite clear, and I have nothing to add.

LORD DEAS.—The late Colin Mackenzie, Esq., executed a deed of entail of is lands of Druncudden and Easter St Martins in favour of a certain series of heirs, and he also executed a trust-deed, by which he conveyed his whole other means and estate (which turned out to be entirely personal) to trustees for payment of his debts and certain other primary purposes, after satisfying which he directed the trustees “to lay out and invest the whole free proceeds of my trust-estate, with the interest which may accrue thereon (subject to the explanations underwritten), in the purchase of lands and estates as near to the foresaid lands of Easter St Martins and Druncudden as they can conveniently be had, and all afterwards settle and secure the lands and estates so to be purchased by a valid and formal deed or deeds of entail upon the same series of heirs (so far as then subsisting), and under the same provisions, limitations, restrictions, clauses contingent and resolute, and other clauses, as are contained in the foresaid deed of entail executed by me,” with power to effect the purchases from time to time as the trustees might judge most eligible, according to the state of the lands and the opportunities which might offer to make suitable and convenient purchases; declaring that upon any purchase being made the free rents and profits “shall be payable by my said trustees to the heir of entail in possession of the said entailed estates of Easter St Martins and Druncudden; and farther declaring that, in the event of any free disposable sum or sums of money being at any time realised, and no opportunity of making an eligible purchase occurring at the time, my said trustees shall be bound to make payment to the heir in possession of the said entailed estates of three-fourths of the free interest or profits of such disposable sum or sums of money until a purchase shall be made, the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of disposable funds,”—the amount of the said three-fourths to be fixed periodically by the trustees, whose statement thereof should be final and conclusive against the heir of entail and all in his right. Then followed a clause in the following terms:—“Decimo, after the residue or free proceeds of my said trust-funds shall be so invested in the purchase of lands and estates, and the same settled and secured in manner aforesaid, I appoint my said trustees to cede the natural possession of the lands

No. 151. and estates so purchased and entailed by them to the heir of entail in possession for the time of the said lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden, and deliver over to them the whole title-deeds thereof," &c.
 June 29, 1877.
 Mackenzie v.
 Mackenzie's
 Trustees.

The import of these clauses admittedly is, that so long as the whole funds were not invested in the purchase of lands, to be entailed along with the lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden, one-fourth of the free income yielded by the funds not so invested should be accumulated for the purpose of adding to the lands to be entailed.

This accumulation went on from the date of the truster's death, on 1st October 1842, and was still in progress when the present action was raised, in December 1876,—a period of upwards of thirty-four years,—no opportunity having (it is alleged) occurred during that period (or up to the present time) of purchasing lands which were supposed to answer the description of lands as near to the entailed lands as could conveniently be had.

It is not, as I understand it, disputed that the accumulation of one-fourth of the annual income during the twenty-one years immediately following the truster's death falls ultimately to go to increase the sum applicable to the purchase of lands to be entailed along with the lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden; but the question is, who is to be entitled to the accumulation so arising between the expiry of the twenty-one years and the date of this action, which accumulation is obviously struck at by the Thellusson Act—(His Lordship here read the Thellusson Act).

The pursuer claims the fund here accumulated after the lapse of the twenty-one years as income to which he would have been entitled had there been no direction to accumulate any part of the income for the purchase of additional lands. The defenders claim it as intestate succession accruing to them as the next of kin, or in right of those who were next of kin at the date of the truster's death.

The pursuer says that, upon the principle of Lord Stair's case, 2 W. and S. 414. and other cases of that class, if no accumulation of any part of the income had been directed he would have been entitled to the whole income of the trust-fund from and after the lapse of a year subsequent to the truster's death, as being a reasonable period for the purchase of lands, just as he would have been entitled to the income of the lands themselves, if purchased and entailed. This may be conceded. But when the pursuer farther says that he is, therefore, to be held the person described in the Act who "would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed," the sequence in the deduction is by no means clear.

That the truster intended accumulation in the present case cannot be doubted for he expressly provides that a certain proportion of the income shall be accumulated and a certain other proportion shall not be accumulated. In all the cases cited the income awarded to the heir from the expiry of a year after the truster's death was so awarded upon the presumption that the truster did not intend the heir to be, in any event, deprived of the income for more than a year, whether an investment had been then found or not. But it is difficult to see how that presumption can apply here, for the truster foresaw and has provided for any hardship there might have been in withholding from the heir an appropriate income for an indefinite period, and he has accordingly fixed what the heir's income shall consist of and what it shall not consist of in the interval till a purchase is made. It shall, he has said, be three-fourths of the income of the trust-fund, but it shall not be the whole of that income.

The truster withheld a portion of the income absolutely till a purchase should made, thereby laying on the heir a compulsitor to insist—which he alone could do—that the trustees should, in due time, invest the whole fund in land, or cause otherwise he would not receive the whole income. Your Lordship proposes to remove that compulsitor by giving the heir the whole income, the consequence of which, apparently, will be that the truster's purpose of investment will continue to be, as it has hitherto been, indefinitely postponed, or may perhaps be altogether defeated.

No. 151.
June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

The entailed lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden are situated in the parishes of Ross and Cromarty, forming a very extensive district as your Lordship knows. The trust-deed does not prescribe either contiguity or vicinity to these lands as a necessary characteristic of the lands to be purchased. They must, of course, be in Scotland, otherwise they could not be placed under a Scotch entail. But except that they must be in Scotland there is no limitation of locality at all, further than that they are to be as near to the lands of Easter St Martins and Drumcudden "as they can conveniently be had." If they cannot conveniently be had as near to these lands as could have been desired, the right and the duty of the trustees seems to me to have been and to be to look to a purchase further off, and the right and the duty of the heir to have been and to be to insist on this being done, as a condition, on which alone, he can claim one-fourth of the income which the truster directed to be withheld from him if the purchase should be made. Twenty-one years, one would think, was long enough to test opportunities of nearness, and when, at the end of that time, it is found that the law prohibited further accumulation for the truster's purpose, I think it was the duty, both of the heir and of the trustees, to have seen that the necessary measures were adopted to procure an investment in land within as short a distance as circumstances permitted, although not such as would have been adopted while accumulation legally applicable to a purchase was still going on. In the place of this sixteen years additional have now elapsed (thirty-seven years in all) and still no land whatever has been purchased, nor is there an allegation in the record either of exertion made to effect a purchase, or difficulty experienced in the way of obtaining one either near to the lands of St Martins and Drumcudden or at a distance from them. I hesitate, in these circumstances, to give the accumulated income in dispute to the heir to whom the truster not only did not give it, but from whom he purposely withheld it.

The truster certainly did not constitute the heir his residuary legatee. That he did not pretend. I do not mean to go over the cases cited in which sums of money accumulated contrary to the Thellusson Act were awarded, wholly or partially, to persons other than the next of kin of the testator or their representatives; but I think it will be found, on careful examination, that, in all of them, this award was made on the footing that these other parties were wholly or partially (and to the extent to which they were so preferred) residuary legatees. That, as I have said, cannot be pleaded here for the heir of entail. Nor can I discover that the truster has either given him or intended to give him the illegal accumulation in any other character. It must be recollected that the rule enunciated in Lord Stair's case was not a rule of law, but a rule of construction merely, of the testator's intention,—and this not an absolute rule of construction but of convenience merely, in the ordinary run of cases, where there is nothing special, or more or less favourable, to the claim of the heir of entail to the income. And it is very difficult to spell out an intention here on the part of the truster to give the heir from whom he had expressly withheld a fourth of the income, to

No. 151. be accumulated for the purchase of land, should be entitled individually to appropriate the proceeds in the event of the purchase being so long delayed that the accumulation had become illegal under the statute law, and for whatever period, however long, during which that delay may be continued. I rather think that is a casus improvisus in the deed,—a state of matters for which the truster has made no provision, either expressly or by any distinct implication,—and, that being so, my leaning is in favour of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

LORD MURE.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship that the direction to accumulate in the trust-deed is struck at by the Thellusson Act.

The question remains, what is to be done with these accumulations? I think that is regulated by the statute, which declares that they are to go "to such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulations had not been directed,"—that is to say, these parties are to get them for their own use, either to purchase land or to apply them to any other purpose. It appears to me, therefore, that they now belong to the pursuer of this action, because by the force of the trust-deed they would have gone to him along with the other three-fourths, if there had been no direction to accumulate. The leading provision of this part of the trust-deed constitutes, in my opinion, a gift to the pursuer and the other heirs of entail of the proceeds of the trust money which was directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be entailed. These proceeds would therefore have gone to the pursuer in the absence of any express provision to that effect under the authority of the cases of Lord Stair and Ogilvie's Trustees a year after the death of the truster. If nothing more had been said in the trust-deed, that would, I think, have been the results in law of its leading provisions; and the observations of the Lord-Justices Knight Bruce and Turner in the case of Combe appear to me to apply. But it has been argued that the explanations in the subsequent parts of the clause take this case out of these authorities. I have not been able to come to that conclusion, because if there had been no further explanatory directions the whole proceeds of the realty would undoubtedly have belonged to the heir of entail. So that the question is reduced to this,—Does the circumstance that the truster appointed three-fourths to be paid over directly to the heirs, and the other one-fourth to be accumulated, but which, in respect of the provisions of the statute, could not legally be done after twenty-one years, deprive the heir of the money thus illegally accumulated? I am of opinion with your Lordship in the chair that it does not; and that by force of the express words of the statute the pursuer is now entitled to prevail.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the opinion expressed by the majority of your Lordships. It is maintained that the Thellusson Act does not apply because it does not appear on the face of the deed that the testator intended that the accumulations should continue beyond twenty-one years, as he expected that the direction to purchase land would be fulfilled within that time. But it has been settled by the case of Lord v. Colvin, 23 D. 111, 3 Macph. 1083, and by other cases here and in England, that it is not the intention of the truster which determines the question of the application of the Thellusson Act. If de facto the accumulations extend beyond twenty-one years they are struck at by the Act.

The question remains, assuming that the accumulations are prohibited, to whom do they go? It appears to me that the whole series of cases, beginning with that of Lord Stair v. Stair's Trustees, have a material bearing on this question. By these decisions it is settled that where there is a direction to purchase lands to be entailed, which comes into operation at once on the death of the truster, and is not deferred till the occurrence of some future event, and where it is the duty of the trustees therefore to proceed to purchase and to entail without delay, the institute and other heirs in their order are entitled to receive the income of the fund after the lapse of a year, just as they would draw the rents if the purchase had been made. However long a time may elapse before the purchase is made the heir of entail is entitled to the income of the fund.

No. 151.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

The general direction in this deed as to the application of the residue of the estate is in the ordinary terms which have been the subject of decision in the cases I have referred to. The truster directs his trustees to lay out and invest the whole proceeds of his trust-estate and interest thereon in the purchase of lands to be entailed, and the truster evidently contemplated that the purchase might take place within a short time after his death. In the absence of a direction to accumulate, the interest of the whole fund would thus have gone to the pursuer as the first person entitled to the succession to the entailed estates.

The deed, however, contains a subsequent and separate clause, providing that the surplus interest exceeding three-fourths of its amount should be accumulated with the capital, so as to increase the amount of the fund to be applied in purchasing lands. This clause, though effectual for twenty-one years, is struck at by the statute for all time thereafter. The direction, so far as regards all time after the lapse of twenty-one years, is declared to be null and void, and the interest is directed by the statute to "go to and be received by such person . . . as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

Who would have been entitled to this surplus interest "if such accumulation had not been directed?" I think the answer to this inquiry must be, the heir of entail in possession. The deed must be read as if expressed in all respects as it is, but without this illegal direction to accumulate a part of the interest, and, so read, the surplus interest belongs to the heir of entail for his own personal benefit and use.

This view is very well illustrated by the cases of Ogilvie v. Kirk-Session of Dundee, July 18, 1846, 8 D. 1229, and Combe v. Hughes, May 2, 1865, 34 L. J., Ch. 344, to which reference was made in the course of the argument. I cannot express the principle better than in the language of Lord-Justice Knight Bruce in the latter case:—"We must, I think, consider that, had the will not contained any direction as to accumulation, but had been in other respects as it is, or had it been expressly confined in its direction for accumulation to the period of twenty-one years next after the testator's death, and had been in other respects as it is, the income of the share called by the testator his daughter's share would in the first case, of the residue, have belonged to herself during the husband's lifetime." So the test is to consider what the result would have been here if there had been no direction to accumulate, and the deed had been in other respects as it is. The heir of entail would then have received this money.

In giving the money to him we are giving direct effect to the literal interpretation, and, as I think, to the true meaning of the statute. The Lord Ordinary says in his note—"The trust-deed in this case fixes the interest of the heirs of

No. 151.

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

entail until the lands are purchased, and there is no room for the presumption on which the case of Lord Stair proceeded." It seems to me that in this way the Lord Ordinary gives effect, contrary to the statute, to the direction to accumulate, because it is in the clause directing accumulation that he finds the expressions which enable him to reject the claim of the pursuer. Without that clause of direction, which the statute declares shall be null and void, there is nothing limiting or fixing the interest of the heirs of entail in the interest so as to alter the ordinary rule. I think we must read the deed as if that direction to accumulate after twenty-one years were not contained in it.

I only desire further to distinguish this case from those which have weighed with the Lord Ordinary in coming to his decision that the surplus interest must be dealt with as intestate succession. There is, I think, an obvious distinction between the present and the cases of Lord Keith's Trustees, 19 D. 1040, and Lord v. Colvin, 23 D. 111, 3 Macph. 1083. Here the direction to purchase and entail might at once have been carried out. In the other cases there was a direction which necessitated a postponement of the purchase of lands, with the result, that till the defined date there could be no heir of entail interested either in the capital or interest. If that had been the case here I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary. A passage from the opinions of Lord Ivory and Lord Curriehill will illustrate my meaning. Lord Ivory says (19 D. 1062)—"As the case stands, the entail cannot be executed until the death of the Countess Flahault. Therefore Mrs Villiers cannot take anything under the directions of the deed. She is not an heir of entail until the very moment when the entail is ordered to be executed. It is not like the case of a trustee being directed to entail from this moment, and where the heir during the period that it is impossible to purchase lands gets the interest of the money. She has no interest or legal right until the time that the trustees are directed to execute the entail and they are forbidden to execute it until the Countess Flahault dies. The effect of that is, that the accumulated rents (which are now made null by force of statute) belong to nobody. They are intestate, and therefore must go to the two daughters." So too Lord Curriehill says,—"The distinction between this case and that of Ogilvie's Trustees is this—in that case the accumulation was directed to take place merely for the purpose of increasing the amount of the fund and at the period when the accumulation was to cease the fund was to be invested. But here that is not the case. The trustees are forbidden to make any investment until the arrival of an event which has not yet taken place; and it is still a matter of uncertainty who will be the institute under the entail when that contingency shall be purified. In the meantime, neither Mrs Villiers or any other person can claim this yearly revenue under the settlement; and there being no direction at all regarding them to which effect can be given, these go to the legal representatives as intestate succession." The facts were similar to the case of Lord v. Colvin. I concur entirely in the law laid down in these cases. There was in these cases a postponement of the right of any person even in the capital sum, and there being no provision about the payment of the accruing interest on that fund, the accumulations would have gone to the residuary had there been a destination of residue. In the absence of a clause of that kind they became intestate succession. Here there is a direction to purchase and entail at once, and when the direction to accumulate flies off, and is practically struck out of the deed, it follows that the fruit of the fund belongs to the heirs of entail. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the pursuer should be found entitled to the surplus interest in question. No. 151.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the said interlocutor : Find that the pursuer, as heir of entail in possession of the estates of Easter St Martins and Druncudden, is entitled to the whole income of the free residue of the trust-estate in the hands of the defenders, the trustees of the late Colin Mackenzie of Newhall, which had accrued since the 1st October 1863, with any interest which may have accrued on the said income in the hands of the said trustees : To the above extent and effect decern in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the libel, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as shall be just."

June 29, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie's
Trustees.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIE, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—
JAMES W. MONCREIFF, W.S.—Agents.

ERSKINE CAMPBELL COLQUHOUN AND OTHERS (Sir John Murray Nasmyth's Executors), Petitioners.—Balfour—Pearson.

SIR JAMES NASMYTH, Respondent.—Kinnear—R. Johnstone.
Et c contra.

No. 152.

June 30, 1877.
Nasmyth's
Executors v.
Nasmyth,
et c contra.

Entail—Improvement Expenditure—Rutherford Act, 1848, 11 and 12 Vict. 36, secs. 15 and 18.—Where an heir of entail in possession has made improvements on the estate prior to 1848, and constituted three-fourths of the expenditure a debt against succeeding heirs, but has died without creating over the state a security, either by bond of annualrent for such three-fourths or by bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of such three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, held that his executors were entitled under the 15th section of the Rutherford Act to require the succeeding heir of entail to execute in their favour a bond of annualrent for such three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, and that the heir had not under the 18th section of the statute the option of substituting therefor a bond and disposition in security over the estate for two-thirds of such three-fourths.

THE late Sir John Murray Nasmyth of Posso, Baronet, while heir of entail in possession of the estates of Posso, &c., under two deeds of entail dated respectively 1809 and 1824, executed certain improvements on the estates of the nature contemplated by the Montgomery Act, 10 Geo. III.

51. These improvements were all executed prior to the year 1848. The expenditure amounted to £6643, 17s.

In 1837 Sir John Nasmyth, adopting the procedure provided in the Montgomery Act, obtained decree constituting three-fourths of the expenditure, or £4982, 18s. 3d., a debt against the succeeding heirs of entail.

Sir John Murray Nasmyth died in 1876, without having created any security, either by way of bond of annualrent or of bond and disposition in security over the estate in respect of the improvement expenditure. He succeeded in the entailed estate by his son, Sir James Nasmyth. By his last will and testament he appointed Erskine Campbell Colquhoun and others his executors.

On 9th March 1877 Erskine Campbell Colquhoun and others, as Sir John Murray Nasmyth's executors, presented a petition, founded on sec. 51 of the Rutherford Act,* craving the Court "to grant warrant to and

* The Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36 enacts, section 15,—“That where any heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland shall have executed improvements on such estate prior to the passing of this Act, and recorded the same in terms of the said last recited Act (the Montgomery Act, 10

No. 152.

June 30, 1877.
*Nasmyth's
 Executors v.
 Nasmyth,
 et c contra.*

authorise" Sir James Nasmyth, and to "decern and ordain him to make and execute over the entailed estate in favour of them or of any creditor who might advance to them the said sum of £4982, 18s. 3d, a bond or bonds of annualrent for the said sum, in ordinary form, in terms of the statute."

On 27th March 1877 Sir James Nasmyth himself presented a second petition founding on sections 15 and 18* of the Rutherford Act, craving the Court to authorise him to make and execute over the entailed estate a bond and disposition in security in favour of Erskine Campbell Colquhoun, &c. as his father's executors, or in favour of any creditor who might advance to him the money with a view to payment to the said executors, for two-third parts of the said sum of £4982, 18s. 3d, or of such lesser sum as should amount to two years' free rent of the entailed estate as the same should happen to be at the term of Whitsunday 1877, and that in ordinary form, containing all the clauses usual in bonds and dispositions in security granted over estates in Scotland held in fee-simple.

To each petition answers were put in by the other party.

To the petition at the instance of Sir John Murray Nasmyth's executors, Sir James Nasmyth objected "(1) The petitioners have no title to make the application. (3) Under and in terms of the 18th section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, the respondent is entitled to grant, in his option, either a bond of annualrent or a bond and disposition in security in respect of said improvement debt; and, in the circumstances, he is entitled to elect to grant a bond and disposition in security, as prayed for in his petition above referred to."

To the petition at Sir James Nasmyth's instance Sir John Murray Nasmyth's executors objected "(1) The petitioner has no title to make the application, and the same is not warranted by the sections founded on (2) The petition should be dismissed as incompetent, in respect of the de-

Geo. III. c. 51), and died without having executed a bond of annualrent as hereinbefore authorised, or having charged the estate as hereinafter authorised, and where decree shall have been obtained, in terms of the said last recited Act, for three-fourth parts of the sums expended thereon, it shall be lawful for the executor or personal representative of such heir of entail, or for any party to whom such heir may have conveyed or assigned such debt, to make application by summary petition to the Court of Session, praying the Court to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate, to execute, in favour of any party such petitioner may think fit, a bond of annualrent, in ordinary form, over such entailed estate, or any portion thereof, binding himself and his heirs of tailzie to make payment of an annualrent during the period of twenty-five years from the date of the death of the heir of entail who shall have executed the improvements, such annualrent not exceeding the sum of £7, 2s for every £100 of such three-fourth parts aforesaid, . . . which bond such heir of entail in possession shall be bound to execute accordingly at the sight of the Court."

* Sec. 18.—"That in all cases in which it may be competent for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, or in which such heir of entail may be called upon to grant a bond of annualrent in terms of this Act, it shall be lawful for such heir of entail, and such heir of entail may be called upon to charge, under the authority of the Court of Session as aftermentioned, the fee and rents of such estate . . . with two third parts of the sum on which the amount of such bond of annualrent, if granted, would be calculated in terms of this Act, by granting, in favour of any creditor who may advance the amount of such two third parts, bond and disposition in security over such estate . . . for such amount, with the due and legal interest thereof from the date of such advance till repaid." . . .

pendence of the petition at the instance of the present respondents. (4) No. 152. The 18th section of the Act 11th and 12th Victoria, cap. 36, does not confer any option upon the heir of entail in possession in the circumstances of this case; and, at all events, he is not now entitled to exercise any such option.”]

June 30, 1877.
Nasmyth's
Executors v.
Nasmyth,
et c contra.

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th May 1877, in the petition at the instance of Sir John M. Nasmyth's executors, pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel for the parties, sists the petition in hoc statu.”

In the petition at Sir James Nasmyth's instance the Lord Ordinary, on the same day, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that this petition is incompetent, and that the petitioner has a title to insist therein.”*

Against both these interlocutors Sir John M. Nasmyth's executors claimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have two petitions before us, which are each intended to create a charge against an entailed estate in respect of three-fourths of a sum of improvement debt constituted in the lifetime of the last heir of entail. One is by Sir John Nasmyth's executors; another is by Sir James Nasmyth, the present heir of entail in possession.

The result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that the heir has it in his option to grant a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of the three-fourths of the improvement debt, or to grant a bond of annualrent for the whole three-fourths of that fund. This of course depends upon the construction of the Rutherford Act, but certainly not upon the eighteenth section alone. It depends a great deal more upon the fifteenth section, under which the executor's right to call on the heir in possession to grant a bond of annualrent is dealt with. Taking the fifteenth and eighteenth sections together, and not leaving out of view the provisions of the fourteenth section, I am of an opposite opinion to that of the Lord Ordinary. I think that, under the circumstances of the case, which falls to be dealt with under the fifteenth section of the Act, the heir in possession when called on by the executors of the last heir to grant a bond of annualrent has no option to substitute therefor a bond and disposition in security for two-third parts of the sum on which the amount of such bond of annualrent would be calculated.

The thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the Rutherford Act provide for the case where an heir of entail in possession of an estate held under a tailzie dated prior to 1848, who has executed improvements on the estate either prior or subsequent to the passing of the Act, and has obtained decree for three-fourths of the improvement expenditure under the Montgomery Act, himself proposes to create a security over the estate for such expenditure. These sections authorise the heir in possession making the improvements to charge the estate with a bond of annualrent for the three-fourths of the sum expended contained in his decree,—such bond to endure for twenty-five years, the interest being calculated at a rate not exceeding £7, 2s. per cent. The result would be that the creditor of such bond at the end of the twenty-five years would have received payment of three-fourths of the original expenditure, with corresponding interest.

* “NOTE.—. . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the petitioner, being heir of entail in possession of the estate, has, under the 18th section of the Rutherford Act, the right of deciding for himself which mode of charging the debt upon the estate shall be adopted.” . . .

No. 152.

June 30, 1877.
Nasmyth's
Executors v.
Nasmyth,
et c contra.

But it may often happen that the heir of entail who executes the improvements may omit to create the security during his lifetime. In such case it was thought by the Legislature only just that the heir's right should pass to his executors, because it was at the expense of his own personal estate that the heir himself made the improvements. It is for this case that the fifteenth section provides. It is applicable to the case where an heir of entail "shall have executed improvements on such estate prior to the passing of this Act, and recorded the same in terms of" the Montgomery Act, "and died without having executed a bond of annualrent as hereinbefore (i.e., in the thirteenth section) authorised, or having charged the estate as hereinafter (i.e., in the eighteenth section) authorised, and when decree shall have been obtained, in terms of" the Montgomery Act, "for three-fourth parts of the sums expended thereon,"—that is to say, in order to let in the application of the clause, the heir who has executed the improvements, beyond recording the same, must have done nothing at all to create a charge upon the estate. In that case the statute provides that "it shall be lawful for the executor or personal representative of such heir of entail, or for any party to whom such heir may have conveyed or assigned such debt, to make application by summary petition to the Court of Session, praying the Court to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate to execute, in favour of any party such petitioner may think fit, a bond of annualrent in ordinary form over such entailed estate," &c., for three-fourths of the improvement expenditure. It is not left to the heir of entail in possession to take action; it is made lawful for the executors of the deceased heir to initiate the proceedings; and it is added, "which bond such heir of entail in possession shall be bound to execute accordingly at the sight of the Court."

Now, certainly enacting words could hardly be more clear and distinct. They confer on the executors, in the circumstances of the present case, a right to demand, and impose on the heir an absolute obligation to grant, such bond of annualrent. I do not mean to say that it is impossible that, by subsequent sections, the Legislature should have qualified this positive enactment, so as to give to one or other of the parties, and possibly to both, a right of option in the matter. But where an absolute right and an absolute obligation are created by a substantive enactment, it requires a very distinct qualification to modify such absolute right and absolute obligation. Now, the eighteenth section of the statute is the only one founded on as importing such qualification. It says: "that in all cases where it may be competent for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, or in which such heir may be called upon to grant a bond of annualrent in terms of this Act, it shall be lawful for such heir of entail, and such heir of entail may be called upon, to charge under the authority of the Court of Session the fee and rents of such estate" "with two third parts of the sum on which the amount of such bond of annualrent, if granted, would be calculated in terms of this Act, by granting, in favour of any creditor who may advance the amount of such two-third parts, bond and disposition of security over such estate," &c.

Now, the construction that the present heir of entail puts upon this enactment is, that it gives him a right to answer the demand of the executors by a bond of annualrent by tendering a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds only of the three-fourths of the improvement expenditure.

As I read the clause, however, it contemplates two cases—first, when the heir of entail having made improvements, and constituted them, proposes, for the own behoof, to create a security ; second, where a previous heir of entail having made and constituted improvements, but not having created a security during his own life, his executors are entitled to demand that the succeeding heir shall create a security in their favour, or in that of their nominee.

No. 152.
June 30, 1877.
Nasmyth's
Executors v.
Nasmyth,
et c contra.

Accordingly the words throughout are alternative. Construing the clause according to the view I take of it, the result is (1) that where it is competent for the heir of entail to grant a bond of annualrent it shall be lawful for him to grant a bond and disposition in security ; and (2) where the heir of entail may be called upon to grant a bond of annualrent he may be called upon to grant a bond and disposition in security. This reading appears to me to be quite consistent with the provisions of the other sections of the statute to which I have referred, and it is further recommended by its being the natural construction of the eighteenth section itself.

I am therefore of opinion that the executors here are entitled to demand a bond of annualrent for the full amount of the three fourth parts of the improvement expenditure, and that the heir of entail has no option but to grant it.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THESE interlocutors were pronounced :—

In the petition for Sir John Murray Nasmyth's executors—" Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to repel the first and third pleas stated for the respondent, Sir James Nasmyth, to sustain the title of the petitioners, and to proceed in the matter of their petition as shall be just : Find the petitioners entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit," &c.

In the petition at the instance of Sir James Nasmyth—" Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the petition, and find the respondents entitled to expenses."

GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIGS, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

DAVID HORNE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Balfour—Asher. No. 153.
ARCHIBALD MACLEAN MORRISON, Defender and Appellant.—Fraser—Rhind.
Partnership—Joint Adventure—Proof—Trust—Act 1696, c. 25—Mandate—Joint and Principal.—In an action for payment of a share of profits of an alleged joint adventure the pursuer alleged that the defender, his co-adventurer, contrary to instructions, taken the title to heritage, belonging to the joint adventurers, in his own name. The defender denied the existence of the joint adventure, and pleaded that, under the Act 1696, c. 25, the pursuer's averment, that an averment of trust, could only be proved by the defender's writ or oath, that as the pursuer averred that he had not trusted the defender to take title in his own name the Act did not apply, and that the pursuer was entitled to prove his averments prout de jure.
sue.—Form of issue adjusted.

July 3, 1877.
Horne v.
Morrison.

DAVID HORNE, builder, Glasgow, sued Archibald Maclean Morrison, 1st Division, Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M. er, Glasgow, for £850, being half the profit said to have been realised in a joint adventure in the purchase and resale of ground in Glasgow.
The pursuer stated (Cond. 1)—" In or about the end of March or beginning of April 1876 the defender and pursuer agreed to be joint adventurers in the purchase of ground at Firpark, Dennistoun, Glasgow."
d. 2) "The interest of the parties in said joint adventure was to be

No. 153.
 July 3, 1877.
 Horne v.
 Morrison.

equal." (Cond. 3) "The defender was to act as the law-agent of and for the joint adventurers." (Cond. 4) "By way of carrying out the joint adventure said ground was, in or about the beginning of April 1876, purchased from William Wilson, builder, and John Herbertson, joiner, both in Glasgow, at the price of £1190." (Cond. 5) "The said purchase was made and the missive with the said Wilson and Herbertson entered into by the defender as agent and for behoof of the joint adventure, or as one of the joint adventurers, in his own name." (Cond. 6) "Shortly after said purchase the defender, acting as aforesaid, sold said ground at a profit of £1700 or thereby to Mr George Lamb, property valuator in Glasgow, and others." (Cond. 9) "The defender has never made payment of the pursuer's half as joint adventurer foresaid of said profit."

The defender admitted the purchase of the property and resale, but denied the joint adventure.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments, at all events so far as material, can be established only by the defender's writ or oath.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea stated for defender, and before farther answer allows both parties a proof of their averments, and to each a conjunct probation."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The case raised a question of trust, and proof should be limited to the writ or oath of the trustee under the Act 1696, c. 25;¹ (2) the action ought not to be allowed to proceed until the title which the defender had granted to the purchaser was set aside in an action of reduction.

Argued for the pursuer;—Partnership and mandate might be proved prout de jure. In order to bring the case under the Act 1696 as one of trust it would be necessary that the agent should have been instructed to take the title in his own name, whereas the averment was that the defender had no authority to take the title in his own name.²

The pursuer was allowed to amend his statement on payment of £8s. of expenses. He then stated, in addition to condescendence 5—"The defender had no authority or instructions from the pursuer to enter into the missive in his own name. On the contrary, the arrangement between the parties and the pursuer's instructions to the defender were, and the defender's duty was, to take the missive in the joint names of himself and the pursuer."

The defender stated these additional pleas in law:—(1) The action is incompetent while the missive of sale remains unreduced. (2) The action is not relevant, in so far as it is averred that the missive of sale was taken in the defender's name, contrary to instructions, without an allegation that this was done fraudulently.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The plea which stood originally on this record was the— "The pursuer's averments, at all events so far as material, can be established only by the defender's writ or oath." The plea was founded on the statute 1696, and I think the Sheriff was right in repelling that plea. I am clearly opinion that the statute has no application to the facts averred here. The averment of the pursuer is that he entered into a joint adventure with the defender on the footing that the joint adventurers were to have equal shares in the adventure, and that the defender was authorised to make the purchase for behoof of the joint adventure. In the original condescendence it was not made quite clear that in taking the title in his own name he had gone beyond his mandate. An amendment has been made in the fifth article of the condescendence which makes the statement quite clear that the defender had no authority to take the title in his own name, and that "on the contrary, the arrangement between the parties and the pursuer's instructions to the defender were, and the defender's duty was, to take the missive in the joint names of himself and the pursuer," and that notwithstanding that the defender took the missive in his own name.

¹ Alison v. Forbes, July 31, 1771, M. 12,760; Duggan v. Wight, March 1797, M. 12,761; Mackay v. Ambrose, June 4, 1829, 7 S. 699; Marshall Lyell, Feb. 18, 1859, 21 D., 514, 31 Scot. Jur. 283.

² General Assembly of the General Baptist Churches v. Taylor, June 17, 1843 D., 1030; Forrester v. Robson's Trustees, June 5, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 75; Dickson on Evidence, sec. 576; Boswell v. Selkirk, March 9, 1811, Hunt Dict. p. 350.

No. 153.

July 3, 1877.

Horne v. Morrison.

The defender says that the pursuer is barred by the statute 1696 from proving that the purchase was made for the joint adventure otherwise than by the defender's writ or oath. The statute only applies when one man alleges that he has trusted another to take a title in his own name. In regard to the defender's new pleas, viz., "The action is incompetent while the missive of sale remains unreduced"—"The action is not relevant, in so far as it is averred that the missive of sale was taken in the defender's name, contrary to instructions, without an allegation that this was done fraudulently,"—I think that either of these pleas can be sustained. The missive does not require to be taken out of the way. The taking it out of the way would have no effect unless what followed could also be taken out of the way. But the disposition to a bona fide third party which followed the missive cannot be set aside. The missive is therefore binding except in a question inter socios. As to the necessity for alleging fraud, I do not see that fraud is required. The missive might have been taken carelessly, foolishly, in good faith, and yet there might be a relevant allegation that it was taken in the agent's name instead of in the joint name of the pursuer and defender. Having taken the disposition in his own name the fraud would con- in the defence of this action. I do not think there is any objection to the pursuer's case, and as the parties are agreed to go to a jury I think we ought to order issues.

JORD DEAS.—I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that this case, as stated in the inferior Court, and still more clearly as now stated in this Court, does not raise a question of trust, but an ordinary question of mandate,—just as if a law-agent were verbally authorised to go to a public sale and purchase an estate for a client, and nothing was said as to the name in which the purchase should be made. The agent might, in such a case, purchase the estate in his own name, and afterwards become a consenting party to a disposition being granted to his client. That is a very common mode of acting. But if the agent should take to his head to say that he had made the purchase for himself that would raise a mere question of verbal mandate, which might be proved prout de jure. Sheriff was right even as the record stood before him, and if the parties had concurred in asking an issue I should have been inclined to send the case to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof.

JORD MURE concurred.

JORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. It would be a very serious

No. 153.
 July 3, 1877.
 Horne v.
 Morrison.

matter if the pursuer of an action, in such circumstances as are here stated, were limited in his proof to the writ or oath of the defender. In the case of Boswell v. Selkirk, March 9, 1811, Hume, p. 350, we have a clear statement of the circumstances to which the enactment applies:—"This enactment was obviously meant for those cases where, for some reason of convenience, and in pursuance of an agreement of parties, the documents or investiture of some right—for instance, the title-deeds of a house, the tack of a farm, the bond for a sum of money—have been taken in the name of one of the parties as if for himself, though truly in trust for the other party, to whom the beneficial interest in the subject truly belongs." The important element, then, is that the original trust must be constituted by agreement of parties. Where, however, you have no trust constituted by agreement, but the title taken in violation of the agreement or understanding of the parties, the question is one of mandate, and inquiry prout de jure is competent. I think that issues in this case might be dispensed with, and the case be tried on the record as it stands.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, by which he repels the first plea stated for the defender in the inferior Court: Repel also the first and second pleas for him, added to the record in this Court: Appoint the pursuer to lodge such issues as he proposes for the trial of the cause in six days: Find the pursuer entitled to the expenses of this discussion, which modify to the sum of £12, 12s. sterling, and for which sum decree against the defender for payment to the pursuer."

The Court approved of the following issue:—"Whether, in the end of March or beginning of April 1876, the defender and pursuer agreed to be joint adventurers, with equal interests, in the purchase of the said ground? Whether, in breach of his duty under the said agreement, the defender entered into the said purchase and resale in his own name and whether the defender is indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £850 sterling, being one-half of the said profit, with interest from 15th May 1876, or any and what part of the said sum?"

J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 154.

WILLIAM LITTLE, Pursuer.—Campbell Smith.
 NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Darling.

July 4, 1877.
 Little v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 23 and 54—S. March 10, 1870, sec. 2.—Held that an interlocutor repelling a preliminary plea, and "appointing the pursuer to lodge such issue or issues as he proposes for the trial of the cause," was an interlocutor importing an allowance of proof and might be reclaimed against within six days without the leave of the Lord Ordinary.

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Adam.
 B

THIS was an action of damages for personal injury at the instance of William Little, Denny, against the North British Railway Company.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders are not liable in reparation to the pursuer, in respect that at the time of the occurrence in question there was no contract of carriage between them and him, or any one on his behalf.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th June 1877, pronounced this interlocutor:— No. 154.
 “Having heard counsel for the parties on the defenders’ first plea in law, repels the said plea, in so far as directed to the relevancy of the action, and appoints the pursuer to lodge such issue or issues as he proposes for the trial of the cause within six days.”
July 4, 1877.
 Little v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

The defenders, on 3d July, presented a reclaiming note without leave of the Lord Ordinary.

A question was raised by the Court as to whether the interlocutor was one containing an “allowance of proof,”¹ and whether, therefore, the reclaiming note was competent without leave of the Lord Ordinary.

The defenders argued that an order on the pursuer to lodge issues imported an allowance of proof, and might be reclaimed against without leave of the Lord Ordinary within six days.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The terms of the Act of Sederunt referred to allow parties to reclaim without leave of the Lord Ordinary against all interlocutors containing an appointment of proof or its equivalent. I had some doubt on the point at first, but on consideration I have come to be of opinion that the interlocutor before us does contain the equivalent of an order for proof, or does import an allowance of proof. If the only preliminary or prejudicial plea in an action is a plea against its relevancy, and where the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sustains the relevancy and appoints parties to lodge issues, I cannot but hold that that imports an allowance of proof. In the present case the plea repelled not in so many words a plea on relevancy, but it is only in so far as directed to the relevancy of the action that it is repelled. I am therefore for sustaining the competency of the reclaiming note.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT sustained the competency of the reclaiming note.

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—ADAM JOHNSTONE, L.A.—Agents.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Bart., Pursuer.—Mackay.
FRANC NICHOLS STEWART, Defender.—M’Laren—Murray.

No. 155.

Entail—Power to Feu with right to Water Supply from remainder of Entailed Estate—Estate afterwards separated—Servitude aqueductus.—An heir of entail in possession obtained power to feu a part of the entailed estate in terms of a form of feu-charter approved by the Court, whereby the feuars were taken bound to “take and pay for,” by way of annual assessment, a water supply provided from another portion of the entailed estate not within the limits of the feuing ground. The feuing ground was afterwards excambied for other lands sold by the heir of entail in fee-simple, and thus became vested in the heir of entail as a fee-simple proprietor. In a question between a succeeding heir of entail and the successor in the fee-simple estate of superiority of the feus, held (1) that the feu-charters granted before the excambion had created servitudes of aqueductus over the entailed estate in return for annual payments which were due to the heir of entail in possession as owner of the servient tenement, and not to the superior of the feus; (2) that feu-charters granted after the excambion were ineffectual to create such servitude.
July 5, 1877.
 Stewart v.
 Stewart.

¹ 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 27, sub-sec. 3, and ss. 28 and 54; A. S. March 10, 1870, sec. 1, sub-sec. 3, and sec. 2.

² Clark v. M’Allister, June 6, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 780; Mason v. Stewart, Feb. 21, 1877, supra, p. 513.

No. 155.

July 5, 1877.
Stewart v.
Steuart.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Ruther-
furd (Clark.
B.

IN 1857 Sir William Drummond Stewart, then heir of entail in possession of the lands of Murthly, &c., obtained authority to feu the lands of Inchewan, part of that estate, in terms set forth in a model feu-charter approved of by the Court.

There was no spring or stream of water on the part of the lands of Inchewan authorised to be feued, and, accordingly, a supply of water for the use of the feuars was introduced from another portion of the entailed estate. The springs on Birnam Hill were collected in a reservoir, and a pipe was also taken from a neighbouring burn, all which sources of supply were beyond the limits of the lands of Inchewan authorised to be feued.

The charters granted by Sir W. D. Stewart in conformity with the model deed contained a clause to the following effect:—"As I have introduced at my own expense water for the general use of the feuars the said shall be entitled to the use thereof along with the other feuars, and shall be bound to take and pay for the same, at the same rate as the other feuars, any assessment for said water, not to exceed the rate of one shilling per pound on the yearly rental, or the valuation (if unset at the time) of the said feu and the buildings thereon; but declaring that the said shall have no claim against me or the heirs of entail succeeding to me as aforesaid for any deficiency in the supply of water, should such occur from any cause not attributable to me or them."

The cost of introducing the water supply was in part at least charged on the entailed estate.

In 1864 Sir W. D. Stewart executed a deed of excambion by which he excambed the fee-simple estate of Stenton for the part of the entailed lands of Inchewan authorised to be feued, which lay to the north of the Perth and Dunkeld turnpike road. These lands of Inchewan were thereafter held by him in fee-simple, and at his death in 1871 were conveyed by his settlement to Mr Franc Nichols Steuart.

Further feus were given off after the excambion, but though the charters bore to be granted by Sir W. D. Stewart, not as heir of entail but as "heritable proprietor of the piece of ground hereinafter disposed," they contained an obligation on the feuars to take and pay for the water.

Sir W. D. Stewart collected an assessment from the Inchewan feuars for the use of the water down to the time of his death. Thereafter a question arose between Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, as heir of entail in the estates of Murthly, &c. and Mr Franc Nichols Steuart, as Sir W. D. Stewart's successor in the fee-simple lands of Inchewan, as to which of them was entitled to collect the water-rate from the feuars on those lands for the future. An action of declarator was accordingly raised by Sir A. D. Stewart against Mr Franc Nichols Stewart.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender being superior of the several subjects contained in the feu-charters founded on by the pursuer, and as the whole obligations contained in these charters must run between the superior and the vassals or proprietors of the dominium utile of the subjects, and as the water-rates in question are payable under obligations in these charters, it follows that the defender, as the superior, is entitled to payment of these water-rates. (3) The pursuer not being the superior with reference to the feu-charters in question, and not being the general representative of Sir William D. Stewart, there is neither privity of estate nor privity of contract between him and the defender's feuars, and he is therefore not the creditor in the said obligation for payment of water-rates.

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th February 1877, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns against the defender, in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses,"

No. 155.

July 5, 1877.

&c.*

Stewart v.
Stewart.

The defender reclaimed.

* "NOTE.—The question presents itself in a different form as regards the feus granted after the excambion and those granted before it. For while the pursuer contends that it was beyond the power of Sir William Stewart to communicate to the former class of feuars the benefit of a water supply derived from the entailed estate, he does not maintain that it was not within his power to confer that privilege on the latter class. With respect to the former, his case is that he is entitled to stop the supply, but that as he is willing to continue it he is entitled to the rate. As regards the latter, he says that as the supply is taken from the entailed estate the right to exact the rate was, according to the true and equitable construction of the feu-charter, reserved to the heirs of entail and not to the superior of the ground which was feued.

"In regard to the feus granted after the excambion the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer is right. He thinks that Sir William Stewart had no right to give to the feuars a water supply from the entailed estate. The water had been legitimately introduced for the benefit of the previous feus, and the vassals obtained a valid right to it. But when the lands of Inchewan were separated from the entailed estate Sir William could not, as proprietor, obtain a benefit to himself and his heirs general which was derived from the entailed estate. If the feus had been granted by the defender as his successor the pursuer would, it is thought, have been entitled to refuse any further supply of water than was necessary for the feus granted before the excambion. Sir William cannot, in this question, be in a better position than his successor, and therefore, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, he had no power to communicate the water supply to the feuars.

"The result, in strictness, would be that the pursuer should take measures to cut off the water supply from the feuars. But as he is willing to give it, and they are willing to take it, the pursuer seems entitled to the declarator which he asks as in a question with the defender.

"The question in regard to the feus granted before the excambion is more difficult, inasmuch as it is not maintained that the water supply was illegally given to them. The defender contends that the obligation to pay the rate is contained in a feu-charter under which he is superior, and with which the pursuer has no connection. The argument is forcible, but the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that it is not well founded.

"At the time when the charters were granted Sir William held the lands as heir of entail, and it follows that whatever benefits were stipulated in favour of the superior were stipulated in favour of the heirs of entail. There is a feu-duty stipulated for the lands themselves, and a water-rate for a supply of water, derived from another part of the entailed estate. When the separation takes place it is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the fair construction of the charter that what is paid for the lands shall be payable to the superior, but what is paid for the water supply shall be payable to the owner of the estate from which it is derived. If there had been a slump payment for all the benefits granted to the feuair it might have been difficult to make a separation. But as the separation has been made in the feu-charter itself there seems no reason why the different owners should not be entitled to enjoy the benefit derived from their separate estates.

"The pursuer produced documents to shew that, in settling the excambion, the feu-duties were taken as the value of the lands. The Lord Ordinary doubts whether this can be taken into account when the excambion is itself unchallenged. But, taken along with the fact that the cost of procuring the supply of water was in part, and probably in whole, charged on the entailed estate, it goes far to satisfy him that his judgment is in accordance with substantial justice."

No. 155.

July 5, 1877.
Stewart v.
Stewart.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am quite satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's grounds of judgment.

In 1857 Sir W. D. Stewart, then heir in possession of the entailed estate of Murthly, Grandtully, &c., obtained from the Court power to feu part of the entailed estate, consisting of that part of the lands of Inchewan which is laid down on the plan No. 20 of process. He proceeded to feu, accordingly, in terms of a form of feu-charter approved of by the Court, the use of which became therefore one of the conditions of his power to feu. This model feu-charter contained a clause with reference to a proposed water supply for the feus to be brought from another part of the entailed estate, binding the feuars to take the water to be supplied and to pay their share of an assessment for the same. Accordingly, when Sir W. D. Stewart granted a feu-charter under his power to feu he did in effect create in favour of the feuar a right of water supply from a part of the entailed estate at some distance from the lands feued by means of pipes laid under the entailed estate. On behalf of himself and his successors he stipulated for an annual payment by way of assessment on the whole land feued.

So far then as the feus granted while the lands feued remained under the entail are concerned there can, I think, be no difficulty. The obligation of the feuar under his feu-charter is to pay for, and his right is to receive, a water supply. His right is a servitude right in which his feu is the dominant and the entailed estate the servient tenement. For that right, it is true, he pays an annual sum. But the purchase of a servitude is no new thing, and I cannot see why a servitude should cease to be a servitude because it is paid for annually instead of by a slump payment. That being so it follows that the servitude being paid for by an annual payment, the owner of the servient tenement for the time must be entitled to receive that payment. It does not matter in the least that it is constituted by feu-charter. It is constituted by writ under the hand of the person capable of subjecting the remainder of the entailed estate to the burden, and he subjected it in consideration of a continuous payment to himself and his successors, not as mere superiors of the subjects feued but as proprietors of the whole entailed estate from which the feuing part was in no way separated under the power to feu.

The case is different when we come to the feus granted after the excambion. The deed of excambion bears nothing on its face about water supply, but it exchanges the two parcels of land as being of the same value. It left the rights of the feuars exactly in the same position as before. It did not prejudice the existing vassals. They remained in possession of a servitude aqueductus on the estate of Grandtully. But when Sir W. D. Stewart went on to grant additional feus after he had become fee-simple proprietor, and to give his new feuars right to water supply from the entailed lands of Grandtully, he did what it was beyond his power to do. As proprietor in fee-simple of the lands of Inchewan he could not possibly give his feuars right to take water from the entailed estate of Grandtully. Therefore, if the feuars are to continue to draw a supply of water from the estate of Grandtully it can only be by agreement with the heir of entail in possession of that estate, and he is of course entitled to demand the assessment as the consideration.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that the defender has no right to draw water from the estate of Grandtully."

water-rate or other annual consideration payable by the owners of the feus upon that portion of the lands of Inchewan included within the brown line on the plan No. 20 of process, formerly part of the entailed estates of Grandtully and others in the summons mentioned, and now the property of the defender, the said Franc Nichols Stewart, which were granted by the late Sir William Drummond Stewart, Baronet, in respect of water introduced by the said Sir William Drummond Stewart, as heir of entail of the said entailed estates, from another part or other parts of the said estates, and at the expense of the entailed estate and the heirs of entail: To that extent and effect declare and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 155.
July 5, 1877.
Stewart v.
Stewart.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

THE ROYAL BANK, Appellants.—Balfour—Mackay.
JAMES BAIN (Brown's Trustee), Respondent.—Kinnear—Strachan.

No. 156.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

Bankruptcy—Preference—Trustee—Heritable Creditor—Pointing of the ground—19 and 20 Vict. c. 79 (Bankruptcy Act, 1856), sec. 102 and sec. 118—and 38 Vict. c. 94 (Conveyancing Act, 1874), sec. 55.—The Bankruptcy Act 1856, by section 102, enacted that the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee should ipso jure transfer to and vest in him, absolutely and redeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect therein set forth. As regards the heritable estate it enacted that it should be vested "to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a pointing of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and reducible, and the creditors' right to point the ground, as is hereinafter provided." By section 118 pointings of the ground which had not been carried into execution within sixty days before sequestration, and pointings of the ground after sequestration, were made available in competition with the trustee only for the interest on the debt for the current half year, and for one year's arrears of interest. Section 118 was repealed by the Conveyancing Act of 1874.

In a question between the trustee in a sequestration and a creditor having a security prior to the date of sequestration who had executed a pointing of the ground after that date but before the confirmation of the trustee, held that the repeal of section 118 of the Act of 1856 left the right of the pointing creditor to be regulated by section 102 and the common law, and that he had right in the moveables attached, his heritable right being prior to that of the trustee.

THE Royal Bank held a bond and disposition in security over certain heritable property in St Andrews belonging to Thomas Brown, tailor, for payment of a cash credit to the amount of £1000 with interest. This bond was dated and recorded in the Register of Sasines in April 1872. Brown was sequestrated on 10th June 1876. The bank executed a pointing of the ground on 16th June, in virtue of the bond and disposition in security. James Bain was confirmed trustee on 30th June.

The bank lodged a claim in the sequestration for £1049, 3s. 11d., being the balance due on the cash credit kept in the name of the bankrupt, and claimed to be ranked preferably upon the price of the heritable subject in virtue of the bond and disposition in security, and also to be ranked preferably on the price of the moveables on the ground which had been

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Adam.
M.

No. 156. sold by the trustee, but which the bank alleged were attached by the pouncing of the ground which they executed on 16th June. The sections of the statutes on which the question depended are quoted in the note of the Lord Ordinary.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

The trustee admitted the claim of the bank to be ranked preferably on the price of the heritable subject, but rejected the claim to rank preferably on the price of the moveables. The bank appealed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the said deliverance in so far as he has rejected their claim to be ranked preferably on the price of the moveable goods and effects situated upon the said heritable subjects in virtue of the pouncing of the ground mentioned in the claim."*

* "NOTE.—The summons of pouncing the ground was executed after the date of the sequestration, but before the date of the confirmation of the trustee, and the question is, whether the appellants have thereby acquired a right preferable to that of the trustee over the moveables on the ground forming the subject of their heritable security?

"Had this case occurred prior to the Bankruptcy Act of 1839 (2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41), it is quite settled by the case of Campbell's Trustees v. Paul, 13th January 1835, 13 S. 237 (7 Scot. Jur. 125), that the appellants would have acquired a preferable right. That case decided that a heritable creditor who had raised and executed a summons of pouncing the ground against his debtor in the natural possession of the estate after the sequestration, but before the confirmation of the trustee, had a real right in the moveables as accessories to the lands, and was entitled to a preference over the moveables in competition with the trustee, to the full extent of his debt, principal and interest, covered by the heritable security. As this preference over the moveables was found in some instances to be extremely prejudicial to the interest of personal creditors it was thought expedient to limit the heritable creditor's right to pounce the ground, and place it under proper regulations when the Bankruptcy Act of 1844 was passed—Barstow v. Mowbray, 18 D. 846, March 11, 1856 (28 Scot. Jur. 341).

"This was effected by the 78th, 79th, and 95th sections of that Act. The Act was repealed by the 2d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. The clauses in question, however, were substantially re-enacted by the later Act of which they form sections 102 and 118.

"By the 102d section it is enacted, that the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall ipso jure transfer to and vest in him, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole property of the debtor, to the effect therein set forth. As regards the heritable estate, it is enacted that it shall be vested 'to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a pouncing of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferential rights as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and void, and the creditors' right to pounce the ground, as is hereinafter provided.'

"The right reserved to the creditor to pounce the ground is to be found in the 118th section of the statute, which provides that 'no pouncing of the ground which has not been carried into execution by sale of the effects sixty days before the date of the sequestration, and no decree of mairs and duties on which a charge has not been given sixty days before the said date, shall (except to the extent hereinafter provided) be available in any question with the trustee: provided that no creditor who holds a security over the heritable estate preferable to the right of the trustee shall be prevented from executing a pouncing of the ground, or obtaining a decree of mairs and duties after the sequestration: and such pouncing or decree shall, in competition with the trustee, be available for the interest only on the debts for the current half-yearly term, and for the

The trustee reclaimed, and argued ;—A poiding required to be executed before it attached anything. The trustee was in the position of a poiding

No. 156.

July 6, 1877.

Royal Bank v. Bain.

arrears of interest for one year immediately before the commencement of such term.

"The result of these enactments as regards poidings of the ground would appear to be to enlarge the rights of the trustee as against the heritable creditor, to the extent of giving him a preference which he had not before, in all cases where the poiding had not been carried into execution sixty days before the date of the sequestration, and of restricting the preference which the heritable creditor could acquire by poiding after sequestration, or within sixty days of it, to the interest on the debt for the current half-yearly term, and for the arrears of interest for one year preceding.

"Had this continued to be the law the Lord Ordinary does not doubt that in respect of the execution of the summons of poiding the ground by the appellants in this case their right over the moveables on the ground would have been preferable to that of the trustee, but only for the interest on their debt for the current term, and for the arrears of interest for the preceding year—(Budge v. Brown's Trustees, 10 Macph. 958, July 12, 1872 (44 Scot. Jur. 536).

"But the 118th section of the Bankruptcy Statute was repealed by the 'Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,' section 55 of which enacts that 'section 118 of 'The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856' is hereby repealed; and it is provided that all heritable creditors who have been in possession under their securities, and whose rights to the rents collected by them has not been challenged by action previous to the commencement of this Act, shall be entitled to retain and apply all rents collected by them in the same manner as they might have done if the provisions of the section hereby repealed had not been enacted.'

"The repeal of the 118th section is unfavourable to the trustee, in respect that it deprives him of the preference which he might have acquired over a creditor whose poiding of the ground had not been carried into execution sixty days before the date of the sequestration.

"The question at issue between the parties in this case is, whether (as maintained by the appellants) the repeal of the 118th section has also the effect of restoring the law as regards the rights of a creditor executing a poiding to the state in which it was prior to the Bankruptcy Act of 1839, and so of enabling him to acquire or assert a preference for the whole amount of his debt by poiding after the date of sequestration? Or, whether (as maintained by the respondent) its effect is not to deprive the creditor of the right of acquiring or asserting any preference whatever by poiding after the date of the sequestration?

"The question appears to the Lord Ordinary to turn upon the construction of the vesting clauses of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. The Act provides (section 102) that the whole heritable estate shall be vested in the trustee, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt subject to no legal exception had been pronounced in his favour and recorded at the date of the sequestration, 'and as if a poiding of the ground had then been executed.'

"But the right thus conferred on the trustee is given subject to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and the creditor's right to poid provided by the 118th section. It was maintained by the respondent that the only limitation on the trustee's right to the moveables (as regards an heritable creditor) was the restricted right of poiding reserved to the heritable creditors by section 118, and that, as this restricted right is afterwards taken away by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, the result is that it leaves the right of the trustee without any qualification.

"The effect of this view of the repeal of the 118th section is, that it would restore to a creditor, who has carried a poiding of the ground into execution, even if within sixty days of the date of sequestration, the preference which he could thereby have acquired before the Bankruptcy Act of 1839; while, on the

No. 156. creditor at the date of sequestration under section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and the moveables then vested in him, and he might have removed them. They could not be affected by a poiding executed subsequent to the date of sequestration.¹

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

Argued for the Royal Bank ;—The preference in poidings of the ground was according to the dates of the heritable rights of the creditors, not according to the dates of the executions of poidings. The right of the bank was prior to the sequestration, and therefore the poiding was preferable to the right of the trustee, which only dated from the sequestration. The trustee at all events could not claim a preference until confirmation.²

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—The Lord Ordinary has sustained the poiding of the ground to the full extent, and his judgment is based on the 55th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, which repeals the 118th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. If it had not been for that repealing clause the Lord Ordinary expressly states that he could not have sustained this poiding of the ground. As regulated by the Act of 1856 the heritable estate of the bankrupt, under section 102, is vested in the trustee “to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, other hand, it would put it out of the power of a creditor to acquire a preference if his poiding shall not have been carried into execution before the date of sequestration. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that this would be a very reasonable state of the law.

“The Lord Ordinary, however, thinks that the sounder view of the law is that a preferable security existed over the moveables in question in favour of the heritable creditor at the date of the sequestration. This right required, no doubt, to be asserted by the creditor, and might be lost if not timeously asserted, but if timeously asserted the creditor was preferred to the trustee. There is no doubt that this was the law before the Bankruptcy Statute of 1839. Lord Ross says in Barstow’s case that that statute made no change in the law except in limiting the preference to the current term’s interest and one year’s arrears. The Lord Ordinary concurs in that view, and he thinks that the effect of the repeal of the 118th section is to destroy the limitation, and to restore the law to the position in which it was prior to the statute of 1839.

“If, then, the heritable creditor had a preference at the date of the sequestration, which was capable of being afterwards declared or asserted, the Lord Ordinary does not think that there is anything in the Act to prevent the assertion of the right as against the trustee after sequestration. The Act says that the estate shall be vested in him ‘as if a poiding of the ground had been executed.’ But preference among heritable creditors does not depend on the priority of diligence, but on the priority of their infeftments. The Lord Ordinary does not think that a trustee is in a better position than an ordinary heritable creditor; and he thinks that the fact that a creditor had executed a poiding of the ground would not prevent a prior creditor from asserting his preference, and it is settled law that the execution of a summons of poiding is sufficient for this purpose. The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that the trustee’s deliverance is wrong on this point.”

¹ 2 Bell’s Com., 5th ed., p. 58; Hay v. Marshall, July 7, 1824, 2 W. and S. 71; Bell’s Pra. 699; 2 Montgomerie Bell’s Lectures, 2d ed., 1186; Wilson v. Tullis, June 18, 1817, F. C.

² Ross’ Lectures, 392 and 455; Stair, iv. 23, secs. 5, 19, and 20; Eskine, 28, 32; Bell v. Caddell, Dec. 3, 1831, 10 S. 100.

and as if a pointing of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and reducible, and the creditors' right to point the ground, as hereinafter provided." Now, no prior creditor could have any available security over the moveables on the heritable estate of the bankrupt except by a pointing of the ground, and the section would have left the law as it stood before but for the words "as hereinafter provided;" and what is there referred to is the 118th section, which has the effect of limiting the right of the pointing creditor—"No pointing of the ground which has not been carried into execution by sale of the effects sixty days before the date of the sequestration, and no decree of mails and duties on which a charge has not been given sixty days before the said date, shall (except to the extent hereinafter provided) be available in any question with the trustee, provided that no creditor who holds a security over the heritable estate preferable to the right of the trustee shall be prevented from executing a pointing of the ground, or obtaining a decree of mails and duties after the sequestration, but such pointing or decree shall, in competition with the trustee, be available only for the interest on the debt for the current half-yearly term, and for the arrears of interest for one year immediately before the commencement of such term." When the Conveyancing Act of 1874 repealed the 118th section it appears to me that it left as the regulating enactment the vesting clause of section 102, except that it took out of it the reference to section 118, which it does upon its face contain, there being no longer any 118th clause.

How stands the matter under section 102? The trustee is to be in the same position "as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt," had been pronounced and recorded in his favour, and as if a pointing of the ground had been executed. But prior heritable securities are saved, as all this is to be done "subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of sequestration." The trustee is to be in this favourable position, that he is to have right to the moveables, as if he had executed a pointing of the ground; but that will not prevent a prior creditor from executing a pointing of the ground. The creditor would have been entitled to point in virtue of his prior heritable right, and having executed his pointing the trustee cannot compete with him. Stripped of the 118th section, the common law right of the creditor revives. I am therefore satisfied with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

No. 156.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

LORD DEAS.—We all know that pointings are divided into real and personal, and that the two are quite different in their nature and effects. Personal pointing is the ordinary diligence by which any creditor may attach and sell his debtor's moveables for payment of his debt. Pointing of the ground is competent only to a real creditor in virtue of his debitum fundi, and is resorted to only in the comparatively rare case when, by miscalculation or emerging circumstances, the value of the heritable subject proves or is likely to prove inadequate to cover the heritable debt. It is consequently much less familiar to practitioners than personal pointing, which is of everyday occurrence. There can be no room for doubt, however, as to the nature and effect of a pointing of the ground at common law. It is a combination of a real petitory action and a real diligence. Pointing of the ground originated in the ancient brieve of distress, and in Rankton's time it was still known by that alternative name—(vide Institutes, vol. ii. tit. 5, secs. 7 and 8). Until the passing of the Act 1469, c. 36, the goods

No. 156. on the ground belonging to tenants were liable to be distrained at any time for the whole amount of the landlord's debt, with no other remedy to the tenant than a right of relief against the landlord, in so far as the value of the goods distrained exceeded the amount of the rent payable. But by that statute this right to distrain the tenant's goods was prohibited, except to the extent of the rents due or current at the time. Subject to this limitation a pointing of the ground, wherever competent, is still, at common law, the most stringent diligence known, except a writ of extent at the instance of the Crown.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

Creditors whose debts are debita fundi are not all in precisely the same position. Those whose debts arise by act of the law, such as a superior for his feuduty and casualties, being, as Bankton explains (2, 5, 21), preferable to those whose debts are constituted by voluntary deeds. But laying aside those whose debts are held to arise by act of the law, all other real creditors who have executed pointings of the ground are preferable inter se, not according to the priority of their pointings, but according to the priority of their real rights.

Thus Bankton says (2, 5, 22),—"The great effect of such debita fundi is, that, both as to bygones and in time coming till they are purged, or the lands disencumbered of the same, they are effectual against the ground preferably to the proprietor, and all deriving right from him. In competition among themselves the superior is preferable for the feuduty in the vassal's charter and his casualties in manner above set forth, because his right is founded on the original grant to the vassal; and conventional debita fundi are preferable according to the date of their respective rights and infeftments whereby they are constituted, and the registration of the same," that is, registration in the record of sasines.

Thus also Lord Stair (4, 23, 5) says,—“The ground of any lands may be apprised by pointing of the ground for any sum wherewith the vassal's infeftment is burdened, or the land may be adjudged for the same sum, and neither the apprising nor the adjudication will come in pari passu with appraisings or adjudications for personal debts, but will be ranked according to the date of the infeftment, wherein the burden is expressed, especially if it be not otherwise expressed in the disposition and charter, but in the seisin,” and this both for principal and annualrent, but still not as in competition with the superior “because the real burden is not a burden on the superior's rights, but upon the vassal's.” We have the same doctrine laid down by Mr Erskine, b. iv. tit. 1. secs. 11, 12, and 13, which I need not quote.

Certain restrictions upon the common law effect of pointings of the ground as in a question with the trustee in a mercantile sequestration, were introduced for the first time, by the Bankruptcy Statutes of 1839 and 1856. But it will be found that while these statutes limited the extent to which the real creditor was entitled to recover under his pointing of the ground, they did not, in any respect, alter the common law nature of the pointing of the ground itself.

The prior Bankruptcy Statutes had neither altered the nature of that common law right nor placed any limitation upon the amount for which it was available. This, which is clear enough on the face of these earlier statutes themselves, will be found to be confirmed by the decisions which followed upon them.

It is true that in Hay v. Marshall, 7th July 1824, (3 S. and D. 157), 25. 22d March 1826 (2 W. and S. 71), it was held that the mere debitum fundi of the heritable creditor did not entitle him to a preference over the personal creditors in a sequestration where he had not executed a pointing of the ground while the moveables were still intact upon the ground. But that was upon the well understood principle that, although a right to seize and appropriate the No. 156.

 moveables is inherent in the debitum fundi, this right must be asserted by July 6, 1877.
 executing a poinding of the ground while the moveables are still there, in order Royal Bank v.
 to bring the right into active operation against the trustee and creditors in the Bain.
 sequestration. The existence of the right to seize is not enough. The seizure must be actually made. The heritable creditor must put forth his hand, and thereby assert the right which belongs to him, while the goods are still there, and all this the law holds that he does by the mere execution of a poinding of the ground, which secures his preference against everybody except the superior or a prior heritable creditor who may come forward in the poinding and claim to be preferred—(Stair, 4, 27, 20). In that case of Hay v. Marshall the goods had been sold and removed, and the price was in the pocket of the trustee, as the property of the personal creditors, before the heritable creditor came into the field, and the question arose, not in a competition for the ipsa corpora of the moveables, but in the course of a ranking on the price. In these circumstances the result of Lord Gifford's elaborate judgment, in the House of Lords, was clearly right, but I may be excused for doubting whether his Lordship had penetrated the arcana of this abstruse branch of Scots law and practice as developed in Mr Ross's Lectures on Conveyancing and other treatises (more instructive than inviting), to the extent it would have been necessary for his Lordship to have done, and I have no doubt he would have done, had the question arisen in different circumstances, such, for instance, as it did in the case of Bell v. Caddell (Treasurer of the Bank of Scotland), Dec. 3, 1831 (10 S. and D. 100).

In that case the heritable creditor had executed a poinding of the ground before the date of the sequestration. The bankrupt statute in force at the time was 54 Geo. III. c. 137, under the vesting clauses of which (secs. 30 and 40), the sequestration was declared to operate as a poinding in favour of the trustee.
 But the word "poinding" was held not to apply to or include poinding of the ground, and consequently the heritable creditor was held entitled to carry out his diligence notwithstanding of the sequestration. In an able note on the subject, Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, following the institutional writers, made the important observation—"Poindings of the ground, inter se, it seems perfectly certain, are not equal, nor depend on priority of time of execution; that proceeding in the first infeftment is preferable."

The next case, Campbell's Trustees v. Paul, 13th January 1835, 13 S. and D.
 37, arose under the same statute, 54 Geo. III. c. 137. The poinding of the ground had there been executed after sequestration, but before the date of confirmation by the trustee. It was found, in these circumstances likewise, that the heritable creditor had secured his preference over the trustee. Whether, if the trustee had been confirmed prior to the date of executing the poinding of the ground, this would have made any difference in the result, it was not necessary to inquire, as the facts did not raise that question.

It is thus clear enough that between the date of the Act 1469, c. 36, and the date of the Bankruptcy Act of 1839 (2 and 3 Vict. c. 4), there had been no innovation upon the common law applicable to poindings of the ground.

The effect of the Act of 1839, secs. 78, 79, and 95, was simply to limit the reference of the heritable creditor under his poinding of the ground to the interest for the then current term, and the interest (if in arrear) for the previous twelve months. The Act made no other change upon the law as it then stood.
 Accordingly in Bartow v. Mowbray, 11th March 1856 (18 D. 846) a poinding

No. 156. of the ground executed by a heritable creditor prior to the trustee's confirmation was found preferable to the trustee and creditors to the extent of the interest for the three half years allowed by the statute. The second Lord Mackenzie was Ordinary in that case, and he observed in his note, quite correctly, that, as regarded the vesting of the moveable estate, there was really no difference between the effect of section 78 of the Act of 1839 and section 30 of the previous Act of 54 Geo. III. c. 137.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

It is not necessary, however, to quote or comment in detail upon the vesting clauses of the Act of 1839, because that Act was superseded and repealed by the Act of 1856, which bears, section 102,—“The act or warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall ipso jure transfer to and vest in him or any succeeding trustee for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration,” (inter alia), “the whole heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implementation of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a pointing of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null and reducible, and the creditor's right to point the ground as hereinafter provided.”

Upon this clause it is obvious to remark that, assuming the trustee to have become a heritable creditor as at the date of the sequestration, and to have, as such, then executed a pointing of the ground, this would not entitle him to compete with a subsequent pointing of the ground executed by a heritable creditor whose real right was duly constituted prior to the sequestration, the preference of heritable creditors inter se being, as has been seen, regulated not by the dates of their pointings of the ground, but by the dates of their real rights. As to the title conferred by the above section (102) on the trustee as purchaser and adjudger as at the date of the sequestration, it is clear that neither of these titles could stand in the way of the prior heritable creditor following out his real right by a pointing of the ground.

The right of the prior heritable creditor to point the ground was not, however, left unrestricted by the Act of 1856, any more than it had been by the Act of 1839. On the contrary, section 118 of the Act of 1856 provided that “a pointing of the ground which has not been carried into execution by sale of the effects sixty days before the date of the sequestration, and no decree of mauls and duties on which a charge has not been given sixty days before the said date, shall (except to the extent hereinafter provided) be available in any question with the trustee; provided that no creditor who holds a security over the heritable estate preferable to the trustee shall be prevented from executing a pointing of the ground, or obtaining a decree of mauls and duties after the sequestration; but such pointing or decree shall, in competition with the trustee, be available for the interest only of the debts for the current half-yearly term, and for the arrears of interest for one year immediately before the commencement of said term.”

There, again, as in the Act of 1839, there is no change made upon the common law nature of a pointing of the ground. On the contrary, the prior heritable creditor is recognised as holding a security preferable to the right of the trustee, and which may be made available by a pointing of the ground after the date of the sequestration, but the amount to be recovered under that pointing is restricted to the interest on the debt for the current half year, and for the arrears of interest for one year immediately before the commencement of such term. No. 156.

July 6, 1877.
Royal Bank v.
Bain.

Thus, then, we find, I think, the common law applicable to poidings of the ground left untouched by the Bankruptcy Acts, with the single exception that a limitation was placed by section 118 of the Act of 1856 upon the amount to be recovered under the poiding. Then comes section 55 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, by which section 118 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, is expressly and unqualifiedly repealed. The consequence seems to me to be inevitable,—that the common law applicable to poidings of the ground stands as it did before the Bankruptcy Acts of 1839 and 1856 were passed, and if that be so it cannot be doubtful that the prior heritable creditor is, in the present case, entitled to prevail over the trustee in the sequestration. It is of no relevancy to inquire why the Legislature may have chosen first to innovate on the old law of poiding of the ground by two successive statutes, and then by a third to restore the old law to its original position. It is a maxim that the Legislature can do no wrong, although it is admitted it may do things very odd. But I am not prepared to say that it is more odd to restore to heritable creditors, by the Act of 1874, the same rights they had till recently immemorially enjoyed than it was to have diminished the value of these immemorial rights to a minimum by the Acts of 1839 and 1856.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

MRS MARY SANDERSON EDMONSTON OR SYMINGTON AND OTHERS, Pursuers. No. 157.

—Asher—Keir.

ANDREW JAMES SYMINGTON, Defender.—Fraser—Scott.

July 6, 1877.
Symington,
&c. v. Symington.

Expenses—Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment—Custody of Children—Expenses of Wife in enforcing Decree.—In an action of separation and aliment at the instance of a wife against her husband on the ground of the husband's adultery judgment of separation was pronounced by the First Division of the Court on 19th March 1874, but the right to the custody of the children of the marriage was not settled, and the interlocutor was not signed till the 20th, when the wife was found entitled to the custody of the whole children. On the evening of the 19th the husband left the country, taking with him the children, and proceeded to the Continent, and thence to America, where he took up his residence. On 24th March, in accordance with instructions given by the husband before leaving Scotland, an appeal was taken on behalf to the House of Lords against the judgment of 20th March. On 11th June following the wife obtained an order for interim execution pending the appeal. Having been kept informed, through solicitors in New York, of her husband's movements in America, the wife followed him there, and through the intervention of the American Court, in pursuance of the order for interim execution of 11th June, obtained possession of the children, and returned with them to Scotland. The House of Lords, on 18th March 1875, so far altered the judgment of the Court of Session as to restore to the husband the custody of the children of the marriage.

The wife thereafter raised an action against the husband to recover the expenses which had been incurred in tracing and following him and in

No. 157. enforcing the order for interim execution. Held that she was entitled to recover all reasonable and proper expenses incurred by her in carrying into execution the orders and interlocutors of the Court regarding the children of the marriage, including the warrant of 11th June 1874 for interim execution pending appeal.

July 6, 1877.
Symington,
&c. v. Symington.
1st Division.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

IN an action of separation and aliment at the instance of Mrs Mary Sanderson Edmonston or Symington, against her husband, Andrew James Symington, on the ground of his adultery, the First Division of the Court pronounced an interlocutor on 20th March 1874.¹ By this judgment Mrs Symington was judicially separated from her husband, and was found entitled to the custody of the whole children of the marriage between her and Mr Symington, being three boys and two girls, all then in pupillarity.

The judgment of the First Division on the question of separation had been pronounced on the 19th March, though the question as to the custody of the children was not settled or the interlocutor signed till the 20th. On the evening of the 19th Mr Symington, who was then in Glasgow, set out with his children for Hull and thence crossed to Hamburg.

Mrs Symington immediately instituted inquiries, with a view of tracing and following Mr Symington, in the course of which she incurred an account of £105, 11s. 8½d. to her Glasgow agents, Messrs Maclay, Murray, and Spens, and of £37 to her brother, the Rev. Biot Edmonston, for travelling expenses.

It was ascertained that Mr Symington had gone to Havre and afterwards to New York, taking with him the children.

On 24th March 1874, in accordance with instructions previously given to his agents, an appeal to the House of Lords was presented for Mr Symington against the interlocutor of the First Division of 20th March, and on the 26th an order for service was issued, which was served on Mr Symington's agents on 27th March.

On 12th May 1874 Mrs Symington presented a petition for interim execution pending the appeal at Mr Symington's instance, the prayer of which was granted on 11th June following.²

Upon finding that Mr Symington had crossed to America Mrs Symington communicated with Messrs Butler, Stillman, and Hubbard, solicitors in New York, with a view of having him followed and his movements watched. Accordingly, he was placed by Messrs Butler and Company under the surveillance of a private detective, under a system termed in America "shadowing."

Upon obtaining the order for interim execution pending appeal Mrs Symington herself went to America, and through the intervention of the American Court, proceeding upon the order for interim execution of 11th June, obtained the custody of her children, and brought them back to Scotland. In the course of these proceedings in America Mrs Symington incurred an account of £390, 8s. to Messrs Butler and Company.

On 18th March 1875 the House of Lords, on the appeal for Mr Symington, so far altered³ the judgment of the First Division as to give back to Mr Symington the custody of the three sons of the marriage, subject to regulations to be made by the Court of Session.⁴

On 9th October 1875 Mrs Symington, with concurrence of the parties to whom the various sums were due, raised an action against Mr Symington

¹ Ante, vol. i. p. 871.

² Ante, vol. i. p. 1006.

³ Ante, vol. ii. (H. L.) p. 41.

⁴ Vide July 16, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 974 ton to recover the expenses which she had incurred in following him and No. 157.

putting into execution the interim order of 11th June 1874.

She pleaded;—(1) The debts in question having been incurred for necessary purposes by the defender's wife, the defender is liable for the same. (2) Separatim, the said debts having been incurred by the principal pursuer in consequence of the wrongful proceedings of the defender, he is bound to relieve her thereof, as concluded for. July 6, 1877.
Symington,
&c. v. Symington.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The whole accounts alleged to be incurred for following the defender and recovering the children cannot be charged against the defender, in respect that the principal judgment in the process of separation was suspended and remained in abeyance till the disposal of the appeal to the House of Lords. (2) The pursuers are not entitled to recover any part of the expense either of applying for or carrying out interim execution. (3) Further, they are not entitled to recover such expenses so far as incurred for travelling to foreign countries and taking proceedings therein, in respect that the order for interim execution on the decree was merely interlocutory, and not enforceable by a foreign Court.

The defender also objected that the accounts sued on were extravagantly charged, and contained large items which could not be recognised in any circumstances, as proper charges between parties to a litigation.

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d November 1876, after finding the facts above narrated, and in addition, “(3) that one of the purposes, and the chief purpose for which the defender went away as aforesaid, was to prevent his children from being taken from him till an appeal should be presented and disposed of in the House of Lords; (4) that though the defender left Scotland suddenly he did not leave by stealth, nor did he, while on his way to, or while in America, use an assumed name, or have recourse to other expedients for the sake of concealment,” found as matters of law “(1) That the facts being as above set forth the pursuer was not entitled to use or impledge the credit of the defender in the proceedings which resulted in the expenses that are now the subject of suit, as for a necessary; and (2) that the expenses, so far as incurred under or in relation to the order for interim execution, are not coverable from the defender, as the application for, and the use of, that order was a privilege which she used at her own risk: Therefore stains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds no expenses due either to or by either the pursuer or the defender, and decerns.”*

* “NOTE.—Even had the Lord Ordinary sustained the grounds of action he could not have sanctioned the incurring of all the expense which is covered by the conclusions of the summons. The pursuer's anxiety may so far be excused; but there is a measure of moderation which must be exacted even from those circumstances of whose position rather stimulate zeal than impose discretion. However, the defender has, upon far wider grounds, been assoilzied, it is unnecessary to analyse the accounts for the purpose of pointing out what was properly and what was improperly incurred. As the pursuer was separated judicially from the defender she was not entitled to use or to pledge his credit in incurring of the debt in which the action has originated. Alimony she had. Her action on the judgment of the Court was suspended by the appeal to the House of Lords, and the interim execution was a privilege and not a necessity. To say otherwise would be in effect to say that it was necessary to act upon a judgment, which, in the Court of last resort, was found to be so far erroneous, and which that reason was so far, in this case, to a material extent, varied.

The Lord Ordinary is aware of no authority for throwing the expense of proceedings on an order for interim execution upon the party against whom they have been used. And so to do in a case in which the judgment in

No. 157. The pursuer reclaimed.¹

At advising,—

July 6, 1877.
Symington,
&c. v. Symington.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of Mrs Symington for the purpose of recovering from her husband the amount of certain expenses incurred by her in carrying into execution interlocutors of this Court in the previous action of separation at her instance. The Lord Ordinary, after findings in fact, “Finds, as matters of law, (1) that the facts being as above set forth, the pursuer was not entitled to use or impledge the credit of the defender in the proceedings, which resulted in the expenses that are now the subject of suit, as for a necessary; and (2) that the expenses, so far as incurred under or in relation to the order for interim execution are not recoverable from the defender, as the application for and the use of that order was a privilege which she used at her own risk.” I am unable to concur in the law so stated by the Lord Ordinary. I think the action must be sustained. To what extent the pursuer is entitled to recover the sums concluded for, or how far the accounts lodged in process represent expenses that can reasonably and properly be charged against the defender, are questions which remain for after consideration. The observation of the Lord Ordinary is sound that “there is a measure of moderation which must be exacted even from those the circumstances of whose position rather stimulate zeal than impose discretion.” But the question in the meantime is whether the Lord Ordinary is right in saying that no part of these sums can be recovered as a necessary or proper part of the expenses incurred in a litigation at the instance of the pursuer against her husband. The Lord Ordinary has made a mistake in point of fact. He says that the pursuer was judicially separated from the defender when these expenses were incurred. No doubt a great part of the expenses were incurred after our decree of separation, pronounced on 20th March 1874; but that judgment was taken to appeal four days after it was pronounced, and pending the appeal its effect was suspended. Even if the parties had been judicially separated at that date I am by no means sure that the Lord Ordinary is right in drawing the very sweeping conclusion that under no circumstances was the pursuer entitled to use or pledge the defender's credit. But it is unnecessary to inquire into that. The Lord Ordinary says, further, that the application for and enforcing of the order for interim execution was a privilege which the pursuer used at her own risk. In short, his Lordship seems to consider the order for execution as a sort of luxury which the pursuer furtherance of which that order had been granted was to a material extent varied would, he thinks, violate the principle upon which orders for interim execution are obtained, and inflict unmerited hardship on those who were forced to fulfil a judgment before it was final.

“On the question of expenses the Lord Ordinary has had difficulty. But there is a discretion in the Court even in cases in which one of the parties to the action has been entirely successful; and using that discretion in the way thought best, the Lord Ordinary has, for the sake as well of the defender as of the pursuer, found no expenses due by or to either party.”

¹ Authorities referred to.—24 and 25 Vict. c. 86 (Conjugal Rights Act, 1861), sec. 9; Paul, March 8, 1838, 16 S. 822; Lady Cardross v. Earl of Buchan, Dec. 17, 1842, 5 D. 343, 15 Scot. Jur. 139; Clark v. Henderson, Feb. 6, 1873, ante, vol. ii. 428; Paul v. Roy, 1852, 21 L. J. Chan. 361; Shedden v. Patrick, 1853, 22 L. J. Q. B. 283; Wilson v. Ford, 1868, L. R. 3 Exch. 63; Brown v. Ackroyd, 1856, 25 L. J. Q. B. 193; Bazeley v. Forster, 1868, L. R. 3 Q. B. 559; M'Cready v. Taylor, June 7, 1873, 7 Ir. Rep., C. L. Ser. 256.

was only entitled to indulge in at her own expense. That appears to me to be a very extraordinary view of an order for execution. The question whether a judgment of the Court taken to appeal should be carried into execution pending the appeal is one for the discretion of the Court, and if the Court are of opinion that it should, it seems to me to be as much the right of the party to have it carried into execution as to obtain the original judgment.

I think that the pursuer is entitled to recover all reasonable and proper expenses incurred in carrying out the orders of the Lord Ordinary and the Court in regard to the children of the marriage, including the order for interim execution, and that with this finding we should remit the whole accounts to the Auditor in order to have his opinion as to what part of the sums claimed fall under this head.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 23d November 1876: Find that, under the conclusions of the summons, the pursuer is entitled to recover from the defender all reasonable and proper expenses incurred by her in carrying into execution the orders and interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary or the Court regarding the children of the marriage between the pursuer and the defender, including the warrant, dated 11th June 1874, for interim execution pending appeal of the judgment pronounced by this Court in the action of separation at the pursuer's instance against the defender on the 20th March 1874: Remit to the Auditor of Court to examine the whole accounts sued for, and to report what portions of the same fall, in his opinion, within the terms of the above finding, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses."

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE LORD PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF THE CITY OF EDINBURGH, Pursuers.—McLaren—Mackay.

THE PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF THE BURGH OF LEITH, Defenders.—
Asher—Harper.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE HARBOUR AND DOCKS OF LEITH, Defenders.—
Muirhead

THE LEITH HERITAGES COMPANY (LIMITED), Defenders.

Property—Servitude—Right of Way—Jus spatiandi.—Held that the uninterrupted use by the public from time immemorial of a piece of vacant and unfenced lying ground as a general access to the shore of Leith, fortified by a possessory judgment of the Court in 1793 in an advocacy of a Sheriff Court process interdict, did not entitle the magistrates of Leith, as representing the public, to prevent the one half of it being enclosed, a sufficient access to the shore being afforded by means of the other half.

UNDER the charter of King Henry and Queen Mary of 4th October 1565, and the Golden Charter of King James VI. of 15th October 1603, and other charters from the Crown, the magistrates of Edinburgh, as representing the community thereof, were formerly proprietors of the town, port, harbour of Leith, and of the land upon which the same was originally situated, and also of other lands adjacent thereto, and still remain proprietors of such lands so far as not feued out by them. Amongst the subjects thus belonging to the corporation of Edinburgh

No. 158.

July 10, 1877.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v.
Magistrates of Leith, &c.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

No. 158. was a strip of ground lying between Salamander Street and the shore of Leith. A portion of this ground at the west end was towards the end of the 18th century feued to the Edinburgh Glass House Company, and another portion at the east end was similarly acquired by the Leith Glass House Company. Between these two pieces of ground there remained unfeued a vacant space about an acre in extent at the foot of Bath Street.

July 10, 1877.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v.
Magistrates of
Leith, &c.

In 1788 the corporation agreed to grant a feu of the vacant piece of ground to the Edinburgh Glass House Company for an addition to their works. No charter was, however, granted, for in the following year, upon the Edinburgh Glass House Company proceeding, with the consent and concurrence of the then magistrates of Edinburgh, to enclose the ground, a petition for interdict was presented in the Sheriff Court, at the instance of certain inhabitants of the burgh of Leith, to prevent them shutting up the piece of ground, which was alleged to be a public access to the shore.

Interdict was granted, and on the process being advocated the Court of Session, on 17th December 1793, confirmed the interdict, and found that the whole space between the works of the two Glass House Companies must remain open for the benefit of the public.

In 1838, by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 55 (an Act to regulate and secure the debt due by the city of Edinburgh, &c.), the port and harbour of Leith were transferred to commissioners, and inter alia the western half of the vacant ground above mentioned was vested in these commissioners, "to form a passage from Bath Street to the sands of Leith."

The remaining or eastern half of the above mentioned vacant piece of ground being claimed by the magistrates of Leith for the public, on the ground that it had for the prescriptive period been open for the benefit of the public, and had been used as a public and patent access to the sands and race ground of Leith, and also a place of public recreation, this action was raised by the magistrates of Edinburgh for declarator of their exclusive right of property in the piece of ground, and for interdict against all trespass thereon.

The magistrates of Leith were called as representing the public, and also the harbour commissioners, and the Leith Heritages Company as representing the old glass companies, the proprietors of the adjoining feus, as defenders.

The magistrates of Leith stated in their defences:—(Stat. 5) "The said piece of ground has remained open to the public in terms of said judgment (of 17th December 1793) and been used by the public as a public road and access to the sea beach or sands, both for carts and foot passengers, since the date of said decision, and also as a place of public recreation. It has also been used as an access to various premises on both sides of the said open piece of ground. More particularly, for the last forty years at least, the said ground or road, measuring 2320 superficial square yards thereby, as shewn on the plan produced herewith, has remained open to the public as a vacant piece of ground, and been in possession of the public, and used as such, and as an access to the beach. It is also of advantage as an open space for the benefit of the public health, and has been enjoyed as such from time immemorial, or at least for forty years and upwards."

They pleaded;—(1) Res judicata, in respect of the judgment of the Court, of date 17th December 1793; (2) the said ground having from time immemorial, or at least for forty years and upwards, been open to and used by the public, as set forth in the present defenders' statements, they should be assoilzied.

The commissioners for the harbour and docks of Leith only reser-the action to the limited extent, as stated in their plea, that "the pursuers are not entitled to decree in such terms as will include, by description or otherwise, any part of the western half of the ground in question, which belongs to the defenders, and the defenders are entitled to have their said half properly laid off, and their rights therein protected."

No. 158.
—
July 10, 1877.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v.
Magistrates of
Leith, &c.

No appearance was made for the Leith Heritages Company.

A proof before answer was allowed to the pursuers, and to the defenders, the magistrates of Leith, the import of which sufficiently appears from the note of the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord Ordinary, on 15th February 1877, pronounced this interdictor:—"Finds and declares that the pursuers are the proprietors of the ground libelled: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It was not disputed that the pursuers are proprietors of the ground in question, and the only question related to the uses which the public had over "For time immemorial there has existed an open piece of ground at the foot of Bath Street, Leith, and lying between Salamander Street and the sea. It appears that at one time the public were in use to bathe opposite this ground, and a bathing house existed on it, which apparently was occupied by the person who let out bathing coaches. It is not quite certain when the bathing house appeared, but the Lord Ordinary thinks that it must be more than forty years ago.

"The accounts of the city chamberlain shew that the ground was in use to be let down to 1834. But though this was the case there was no restriction on the use of it by the public. They had access to the sea on both sides of the bathing house, and after that house ceased to exist they had access to the sea over the whole ground.

"In 1789 the Edinburgh Glass House Company, the feuers of the adjoining ground, with the consent of the pursuers, proposed to enclose a part of the ground. This was resisted by certain inhabitants of Leith, and a process of interdict was raised in the Sheriff Court. The process was advocated, and on the 12th December 1793 the Court confirmed the interdict which the Sheriff had granted, and found that the whole ground must remain open for the benefit of the public, reserving all questions as to the bathing house. Since that time no attempt has been made to limit the uses of the public. Accordingly the whole ground has been used as an access to the sea, and it has been put to some uses for the purpose of recreation though not in a very definite way.

"In 1833 the town of Leith became a parliamentary burgh. But the city of Edinburgh retained its property. In 1838, under the authority of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 55, it conveyed one half of the open ground to the Leith Dock Commissioners, to form a passage from Bath Street to the sands. The remainder, which is the portion now in question, was conveyed in security to the creditors of the city.

The pursuers contend that the only right which the public possessed over the ground was a right of passage, that the portion conveyed to the Leith Dock Commissioners is sufficient for the exercise of that right, and that in consequence the remainder may be dealt with by the pursuers as they think proper.

The defenders urge that the decree of 1793 is res judicata in their favour.

The Lord Ordinary cannot assent to this view. The process originated in the Sheriff Court. But the jurisdiction of that Court did not extend beyond the limitation of possession till the question of right was decided, and it is thought that the Court of Session could not in an advocacy exercise a wider jurisdiction than belonged to the Sheriff.

But although the decree does not sustain the plea of res judicata it is of

No. 158. The pursuer reclaimed.¹
At advising,—

July 10, 1877.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v.
Magistrates of
Leith, &c.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The ground in question is situated within the burgh of Leith, between Salamander Street on the south, and the shore on the north. On the east and west sides it is bounded by buildings. It is, in short, building ground within the burgh. It has been left open and unenclosed for a very long time, but I have no idea that because a building stance remains for forty years unbuilt upon and unfenced it thereby becomes juris publici. If that were good law the result would be that it would be impossible that any piece of private property within a town capable of being traversed by the public as this was could remain open and unfenced without the proprietor substantially losing his right of beneficial enjoyment of his property. That seems to me to be quite extravagant. But, in point of fact, the ground has not been of any practical use to the public, except as an access from Salamander Street to the shore, and in later years to a road on the south side of the new docks.

The defenders say it was used as a place of public recreation or play ground, that games of various kinds were played upon it, and that this has been going on constantly since the judgment of 1793. But this averment is negatived by the evidence. Games have no doubt been played from time to time upon it by boys, as will always be the case with ground remaining unbuilt on and unfenced. But what the defenders are really claiming on behalf of the public is a jus spatiiandi, a kind of right which, as distinguished from a right of way, was, in the case of Dyce v. Hay, found to have no existence in the law of Scotland.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I think, in place of assoilzieing the defenders from the whole conclusions of this action, except the mere declarator of property, decree ought to be pronounced in favour of the pursuers, in terms of the whole conclusions of the summons.

LORD DEAS.—The vacant ground in question, running from Salamander Street towards the sea, seems to be not more than equal to the breadth of two good material importance in this case. It determines what was the state of possession at the time, and what, in accordance with the decree, has been the state of possession since that time. The whole ground having been left open for the benefit of the public, the question is, can the public be now restricted to the use of one half? The Lord Ordinary thinks that it should be answered in the negative.

"This is not the ordinary case where a servitude of public right of road is claimed over the property of another. It resembles more the case of Sanderson v. Lees (22 D. 24), where it was held that the uses which for time immemorial the public had had over the links of Musselburgh formed a quality of the right of tenure. The subject, no doubt, is different in character. But the community are interested in having the ground in question kept open, considering the long enjoyment which they have had of it under the interdict which was granted in 1793. The Lord Ordinary thinks that he must refuse the pursuers the decree which they ask."

¹ Authorities referred to.—Sanderson v. Lees, Nov. 25, 1859, 22 D. 24; 11 Scot. Jur. 14; Dyce v. Hay, July 10, 1849, 11 D. 1266, 21 Scot. Jur. 14; Hume v. Young, May 25, 1852, 15 D. (H. of L.) 14, 1 Macq. 305, 24 Scot. Jur. 465; Hume v. Young, Dec. 18, 1846, 9 D. 286, 19 Scot. Jur. 109; Burntisland case, 1846, note of Lord Ordinary (Cunninghame) in Hume v. Young, 9 D. 293-4, 21 Scot. Jur. 112; Jenkins v. Murray, July 12, 1866, 4 Macph. 1046, 28 Scot. Jur. 532; Mackintosh v. Moir, 9 Macph. 574, 43 Scot. Jur. 402.

streets, perhaps not so much. One-half of that breadth is proposed to be left for the public use. The question, therefore, relates only to the other half. No. 158.

There appears to have been a time when uses were made of that ground which might have raised a question had they not been long discontinued. Bathing machines for the use of the public were kept upon the ground, and from which the corporation drew rents. There was a hut for the keeper, and a wooden erection for his horses. But there has been nothing of this kind within the period of prescription. After 1834 no rent was received or even asked, and all trace of beneficial occupancy disappeared. I find no proof of anything in the nature of a servitude beyond a right of access to the sea, and even that has ceased to be of use for bathing purposes, owing to the construction of the new docks, and the formation of the railway. Within the last forty years no use whatever has been made of the ground, except what is made by men and boys, every day in the year, of the streets of a burgh like Leith. The playing at "boobs," that is, marbles, seems to have been the great amusement there, but everybody knows that marbles are frequently played by children upon the streets and pavements where the traffic is small; and running about or standing lounging is still more common. As to the quoits and the shinty, when the proof is examined I think it appears that there have not been above two or three instances of either of these within the memory of man, and it would be a new question whether playing quoits and shinty over a bit of ground or street like this could constitute a servitude in place of a nuisance. The right to a road of this kind is so far of the nature of a servitude in favour of the public that it may be restricted if a sufficient breadth for all purposes be left. There is no right in the public beyond that. I do not think it is disputed that the road left, of which the public are to have the use, is abundantly sufficient for any right of passage that can be asserted by them, and therefore I entirely agree with your Lordship that there is no room for the view taken by the Lord Ordinary.

July 10, 1877.
Magistrates of Edinburgh v.
Magistrates of
Leith, &c.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the defences, and decern in terms of the declaratory and other conclusions of the libel: Find the defenders, the provost, magistrates, and town-council of Leith, liable to the pursuers in expenses," &c.

W. WHITE-MILLAR, S.S.C.—W. H. COUPER, L.A.—TORREY & PITCAIRN, W.S.—Agents.

MRS JESSIE BAILLIE OR GIBSON AND OTHERS (Gibson's Trustees), Pursuers.—Asher—Mackintosh.

No. 159.

ROBERT FRASER, Defender.—Trayner—Lorimer.

July 10, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

Process—Summons, amendment of—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 29.—A summons concluded for implement of an agreement, consisting of eight heads, between the outgoing and incoming tenants of a farm, was averred in the condescendence that certain points were agreed to by the parties verbally, and that then the agreement was reduced to writing, and agreed to in draft by both parties, and followed by rei interventus, but that the defender afterwards refused to sign it. After a proof the Lord Ordinary dismissed the action. The pursuer reclaimed, and proposed to amend his summons without altering the condescendence, by limiting the conclusions to one of the eight heads of the agreement, which he averred was verbally agreed to (before

No. 159. the agreement was reduced to writing), and afterwards followed by rei interventus. Motion refused, on the ground that the amendment would raise a different question between the parties from that intended by the summons.

July 10, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Ruth-
furd Clark.
B.

THIS was an action by the trustees of the late Patrick Gibson, tenant of the farm of Cairnbank, near Montrose, against Robert Fraser. The summons concluded for declarator "that an agreement was entered into between the pursuer and defender, whereby it was agreed as follows:—" (1 and 2), that the defender should take over the turnip crop of the pursuers' farm, and other articles, at a valuation; (3) that certain persons should be arbiters; (4) that the prices should be payable at certain dates; (5) that the defender should take over the servants; (6) "that in respect the pursuers agreed to give the defender immediate access to the steading for the purpose of repairing and enlarging the same, the defender, in consideration thereof, should accept and accepted of the whole houses, buildings, stone dykes, fences, hedges, ditches and drains on the said farm (excepting the dwelling-house, and range of stables, &c., of which possession was not to be ceded), as in the condition in which the outgoing tenant was bound to leave them; and the defender agreed and bound and obliged himself to free and relieve the pursuers of all claims competent to the landlord in respect of the said houses, buildings, stone dykes, fences, hedges, ditches and drains (excepting as aforesaid);" (7) regarding the expense of the arbitration; lastly, that the parties should implement the agreement under a penalty of £100. There was also a conclusion that the defender should be ordained "to implement and fulfil the said contract or agreement, and to execute along with the pursuer a minute of agreement in the terms of the said contract or agreement as before narrated," and an alternative conclusion for damages.

The action was raised in October 1876. The pursuers set forth that Gibson's lease of Cairnbank expired at the ensuing Martinmas, and that in the course of July and the early part of August it had been arranged and agreed between them and the defender, who was the incoming tenant (Cond. 3) that he should take over the turnip crop and other articles as concluded for in the summons; further (Cond. 4) that he should accept of the houses, fences, &c. as they were, and relieve the pursuers of any claim by the landlord, in consideration of which he was to obtain immediate access to the steading. These averments were in substance denied.

It was also averred (Cond. 5) that the pursuers and defender had a meeting on 22d August and considered a draft minute of agreement embodying these arrangements in terms of the conclusions of the summons, which the pursuers had previously sent to a person acting for the defender, and that the pursuers had the draft extended and sent for signature. "So far," it was averred, "as the various points of agreement mentioned in the summons had not been adjusted previously, as set forth in the preceding articles, they were adjusted and agreed upon at the said meeting when the said draft was gone over." (Cond. 6) "Consequent upon the conclusion of the various arrangements set forth in the 3d and 4th articles of the condescendence, the defender, on or about 16th August, was allowed to enter into possession of the steading of said farm, and he did enter into possession thereof, and erected his stacks upon the stathels and boses agreed to be taken over, and made use of various portions of the steading. Further following on what took place at the said meeting in Mr Shiell's office on 22d August, the defender (1) took over the pursuer's servants; (2) took over possession of the machinery of the threshing-mill; (3) proceeded to use the courts and portions of the steading other than those taken possession of on 16th August; (4) carted into and around the steading about 130 loads of building material; and (5) used a quantity of straw for covering stacks, in terms of an arrangement come to at said meeting. Notwithstanding all this, however, the defender, on the minute of agreement being sent to him for signature, refused to sign the same, and repudiated the said agreement." No. 159.

The pursuers pleaded;—The defender having entered into the agreement libelled with the pursuers, and having refused to implement the same, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, dismissed the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and proposed to amend the summons by deleting all the heads of the alleged agreement except the sixth, so that the first conclusion should run "that it should be found and declared that in respect the pursuers agree to give," &c. as above, and by deleting also in the second conclusion the words "and to execute along with the pursuers a minute of agreement in the terms of the said contract or agree-

July 10, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Fraser.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary regrets that he has been obliged to pronounce this decision. But from the form of the action he does not think that he can do otherwise. No proposal was made to amend the summons.

"The only purpose of the action is to declare that the pursuers and defender entered into an agreement consisting of eight different heads. It is contained in an informal writing prepared by Mr Shiell, as the agent of the pursuers, and sent to the defender on 18th August 1876. It was not signed by the defender, but the pursuers alleged that rei interventus followed.

"It is plain from the evidence that, before the writing was drawn up, no such agreement as that which it expresses was ever entered into between the parties. Certain obligations existed on the pursuers and defender as the outgoing and incoming tenants. But these were ascertained by the lease, and, with perhaps a small exception relating to the time when the turnips were to be removed, it had never been proposed to make them the subject of any agreement. Indeed, at the time when the writing was sent to the defender, it is not contended by the pursuers that anything had been agreed on, except that the defender was to take over a number of farm articles, and that, in consideration of his obtaining immediate access to the steading, he should take over the houses and fences as being in the condition in which the pursuers were bound to leave them. The defender does not deny that he agreed to take the farm articles, but he maintains that he never undertook to accept the houses and fences.

"After the writing was communicated to the defender a meeting took place on 22d August. The pursuers say that the defender approved of it and agreed to sign it, and indeed that it would have been signed then and there but that it was only in scroll. The defender says that he refused to sign it in consequence of his objection to the clause relative to the houses and fences, but he does not seem to have stated much, if any, objection to the other clauses. It is certain, however, that when it was sent to him on the 23d of August for his signature he refused to sign it, and returned it.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers have not established that the agreement libelled was concluded between them and the defender. It was intended to be reduced to writing, and the defender refused to sign it. Even assuming that the defender agreed to it, there was locus penitentiae until it was signed; and in regard to the question whether the agreement as a whole was ever concluded, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that nothing followed between the 22d and 24th of August to prevent the defender from resiling. On the 24th of August the defender definitely refused to sign, and his refusal was never withdrawn.

"The real question between the parties was whether the defender agreed to take over the buildings and fences as in good order. On this question there is a painful conflict of evidence. But the Lord Ordinary forbears to express any opinion upon it, as, owing to the form of the action, he cannot decide it. He is thought it proper to dismiss the action, and not to asscilzie."

- No. 159. ment as before narrated." It was not proposed to alter the condescendence.
 July 10, 1877. The defender opposed the amendment, and referred to the case of Gibson's Trustees v. Forbes v. Watt, Nov. 9, 1870, 9 Macph. 96.
 Fraser. At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The 29th section of the Act of 1868 gives very large powers of allowing amendments of the record and issues at any time, and even contains imperative words directing the Court to allow all amendments which may be necessary for determining the real question in controversy between the parties.

The meaning of these words is very important. They cannot mean that amendments may be made so as to enable the parties to obtain judgment on any question. Some particular question must be meant, and that is the question which is raised by the summons or other original pleading. Therefore, if an attempt is made to raise a different question, it is not only not imperative on us to allow it, but it is plainly beyond the scope of the statute. That is well illustrated by the case of Forbes v. Watt, decided in the Second Division, in which the question which the party endeavoured to raise at the end of the case was a separate dispute, not originally intended to be raised at all.

Here also the proposed amendment comes at the end of the case on a closed record and a concluded proof, after judgment has been given against the pursuers and only when they come to reclaim. No doubt the statute says that amendments may be allowed at any time. But the stage at which they are proposed is a material element in determining whether they ought to be allowed.

But the important point is whether the summons as proposed to be amended raises the same question as the summons when brought into Court. Now, with all inclination to deal leniently in matters of this kind, I am quite unable to affirm that it does. The question raised by the amendment is different. The summons must be judged of, not by the conclusions merely, but also by the condescendence and pleas.

Now, in the condescendence the pursuers set forth in articles 3 and 4 various details of arrangements between them and the defender regarding the removal of the one and the commencement of the possession of the other. Then follow the 5th article relative to the draft agreement. It is plain that the contract alleged to have been concluded consisted of a variety of items which formed the subject of verbal negotiation and adjustment at different times, beginning some time before the expiry of the pursuers' tenancy, and going on on different days embracing 16th August and coming down to 22d August, the day when the draft was made the subject of negotiation. Thus the condescendence shows that a part of the agreement which the pursuers now insist in was not even made the subject of negotiation till 22d August. The pursuers' plea in law is—"The defender having entered into the agreement labelled with the pursuers, and having refused to implement the same, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for." The pursuers' statements and their plea amount to an averment that an agreement was made in terms of the draft produced, and that the pursuers are entitled to have it enforced; and what do we find in the conclusions? The whole of the draft is engrossed in it, and it is craved that the defender should be ordained to implement it in its whole tenor and conditions.

On the other hand, what is intended by the proposed amendment? To amend a verbal agreement in terms of one of the eight heads of the draft, and not else,—that is, to enforce against the defender, as if it were a separate agreement, No. 159.

 one item of the agreement which the summons was brought to enforce. That is a startling proposal, and I am satisfied that it falls within the category to which the 29th section does not apply, namely, a proposal made at the end of a cause to raise a question not raised and not intended to be raised by the summons.

July 10, 1877.
 Gibson's
 Trustees v.
 Fraser.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN HENRY, S.S.C.—D. & W. SHIRESS, S.S.C.—Agents.

ANDREW AITKEN AND OTHERS (Robert Baird's Trustees), Pursuers.—

No. 160.

Asher—M'Kechnie.

ROBERT BAIRD AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Kinnear.

July 10, 1877.
 Baird's
 Trustees v.
 Baird and Co.

Interest—Sale—Price payable by instalments—Payments in Error—Repetition.—In a mineral lease it was stipulated that the lessees should take over the machinery and plant as valued by a named valuator, “the amount of such valuation to be payable . . . by ten equal instalments extending over a period of ten years, each of which instalments shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, and shall bear interest in case of failure in the punctual payment hereof at the rate of five per centum per annum on the amount which may remain due until payment, but the lessees shall have power to pay up the whole sum at any earlier period when it may be convenient for them to do so;” it was declared also that though they might be in possession of the plant, &c., and have the use of it, it was to remain the property of the lessor “until the whole price and interest thereof shall be paid.” For three years the lessees paid the instalments, and each year they also paid a sum of interest at the rate of five per cent upon the unpaid balance of the whole price.

In an action at the instance of the lessor for an unpaid instalment and interest on the unpaid balance of the whole price, held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the lessees were only liable for interest on instalments in arrear, and that the previous payments of interest having been made in error the lessees were entitled to credit for the overpayments in accounting with the lessor.

By lease dated 1st July 1871 Robert Baird, coalmaster, Airdrie, proprietor of the lands of Limerigg and Wester Drumclair in the county of Airdrie, let to his brother William Baird, architect, Airdrie, and John Wotherspoon, colliery manager, the coal, shale, and ironstone under these lands, with certain reservations, for a period of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1871. After providing for payment of fixed rent or lordships, in the option of the lessor, the lease proceeded,—“And it is hereby stipulated and agreed that the said William Baird and John Wotherspoon shall take over all the pits, engines, and machinery, workmen's houses, and other buildings connected with the colliery, railways, locomotives, waggons, and other plant, both fixed and moveable, . . . belonging to the said Robert Baird, situated at or connected with said coal-workings, at a valuation to be put thereon by Alexander Simpson, mining engineer, Glasgow, or, failing, by a skilled person to be mutually chosen for that purpose; the amount of such valuation to be payable by the second parties by ten equal instalments, extending over a period of ten years, each of which instalments shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, and shall bear interest, in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof, at the rate of five per centum per annum on the amount which may remain due, until payment, but the lessees shall have power to pay up the whole sum at any earlier period when it may be convenient for them to do so; declaring that while the second parties shall be entitled to the use and

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Young.
 I.

No. 160. occupation of said pits, engines," &c., "the same shall not be transferred to them or become their property, but shall remain and continue to be the property of the first party, until the whole price and interest thereof shall be paid, when the same shall become the absolute property of the second parties, but no sooner."

July 10, 1877.

Baird's

Trustees v.

Baird and Co.

William Baird and John Wotherspoon entered into possession under the lease under the firm of Robert Baird and Company, and worked the minerals.

On 20th August 1871 the mining plant, &c., referred to in the lease, was duly valued by Alexander Simpson, the valuator named, at £19,682, 16s. 3½d.

Robert Baird died on 26th November 1871, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement under which Andrew Aitken and others were appointed trustees.

Robert Baird and Company, upon an account prepared by the factor for Robert Baird's trustees being sent them in May 1872, paid a first instalment of the valued price of the mineral plant, amounting to £1982, 1s. 3½d., and also, as charged in that account, a sum of £862, 16s. 1d., being interest at the rate of five per cent from 1st June 1871 to 15th May 1872 upon the full amount of the valued price. Separate and detailed receipts for these two payments were granted upon 24th May 1872 by the factor for the trustees.

On 10th June 1873 Robert Baird and Company paid a second instalment of the valued price of the plant, and also a sum of £885 as interest on the balance of the whole price, after deduction of the first instalment, both as set forth in an account sent by the factor to them and him duly discharged.

On 20th July 1874 a similar account for a third instalment, and a sum of £756, 13s. 4d. as interest upon the balance after deduction of two instalments, prepared by the factor, was paid by Robert Baird and Company, and duly discharged.

On 1st June 1875 an account prepared in the same way as the three preceding ones was rendered to the tenants, but they delayed to pay it, and, on 2d March 1876, the trustees of Robert Baird raised an action against Robert Baird and Company, in which, inter alia, they concluded for payment of lordships, &c., which they alleged to be due, and for the fourth instalment of the price of the plant and machinery, and for interest upon the balance of the whole price after deduction of three instalments.

Separate answers were lodged for William Baird and John Wotherspoon, the only partners of Robert Baird and Company. In these defences no question was raised as to the interest due.

A record was made up, and while the cause was in the procedure and the trustees, on 4th July 1876, raised a second and supplementary action against Robert Baird and Company, in which, after giving credit for certain payments made by the tenants since the raising of the former action, they concluded for the alleged balance remaining due under the first summons, and also for a fifth instalment of the price of the plant and machinery, and interest upon the balance of the whole price, after deducting four instalments. The other conclusions were the same as in the former action. In the defences to this action William Baird in his answer to the article of the condescendence, which set forth in detail the items of the account sued for, "denied that any interest is due on the amount of the instalments of the value of the said plant which have not become payable;" and Wotherspoon pleaded,—"The defenders are not liable in the sums of interest concluded for; and in particular for the interest claimed on the balance of the amount of the valuations."

On 15th November 1876 the actions were conjoined, and on 22d No. 160. November the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—" Finds that the defenders are not liable to the pursuers in the interest charged on the amount unpaid of the value of the pit, engines, machinery, &c. (so far as not in arrear), amounting, the said interest, as set forth in article 8 of the condescendence appended to the summons in the second action, to £1278, 6s. 8d. sterling: Assolizies the defenders to that extent from the conclusions of the conjoined actions, and decerns: Finds the defenders liable in the sum of £3738, 13s. 7d., as brought out in the state No. 28 of process, with interest thereon from the 7th day of July 1876 till payment, and decerns accordingly: Allows interim extract; and quoad ultra supersedes consideration of the case in hoc statu, reserving all questions of expenses: Upon the pursuers' motion grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor."

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

The trustees reclaimed, and, on 10th March 1877, the record was opened up and additional statements by both parties were added. The pursuers' amendments, so far as material, were as follows:—" With respect to the payment of the instalments and interest on capital, the course of dealing always was that an account of the instalment due, with a detailed statement of the interest on the capital sum unpaid, was rendered to the defenders at the same time as the account for lordship was rendered in each year. The payments for the first three years of the lease, of which detailed accounts were rendered to the defenders as aforesaid, were as follows." (Here came statement of accounts, &c., as narrated supra.) "It was the agreement of parties, and the said houses, pits, engines, &c., were valued at the foresaid sum on the footing that interest on the unpaid capital was to be payable as alleged by the pursuers. The valuation was made on the footing that the subjects let by the lease were being used as going concern. Mr Simpson was not informed by either party, and, in point of fact, did not know, the terms of the lease, or the fact that the amount of the valuation was to be paid by instalments. In point of fact, Mr Simpson believed, when making the said valuation, that the price was to be paid immediately, in one cash payment, and he made the valuation on that footing."

The defenders' answer to this statement was,—“The payments credited were made to account of lordships. Denied that any interest is due on the amount of the instalments of the value of the said plant which have not become payable. It is denied that there was any agreement in reference to the pits, engines, and other plant and subjects specified in the lease, as to the valuation thereof, except what is contained in the lease itself. But it is explained that Robert Baird, the granter of the lease, was brother of the defender, William Baird, and that John Wotherspoon, the other tenant, had been the manager of his, Robert Baird's, collieries; and it is averred that the said Robert Baird intended that the lease should be very advantageous bargain for the tenants. Admitted that the valuation as made by the said Alexander Simpson, and that he valued the subjects as for a going colliery. . . . Admitted that at or about the term Whitsunday in 1872, 1873, and 1874 accounts were rendered on behalf of Robert Baird's trustees to the defenders, Robert Baird and Company. These accounts were rendered by Mr Rodger, who was commissioner or factor for Robert Baird's trustees, under a commission or factory granted by him, and by whom the affairs of the trust were managed. Admitted that in each of these accounts the said defenders were charged with interest on the unpaid amount of the valuation of the said pits, engines, and other plant and subjects; and explained that the said accounts formed representations by the factor for the trustees that these

No. 160. sums of interest were due. The defender, William Baird, relied on these representations, and paid the sums demanded, in the belief that they would not have been demanded unless they were due. The sums so charged as interest on the unpaid amount of the valuation, and paid by the defender, were as follows :—(In all £2390, 2s. 6d.) “ But the defender is advised and avers that no interest was or is due on the amount of the said valuation, except on overdue instalments thereof, from the dates at which the said instalments fell due, and that the pursuers and their factor had no right to represent that such sums of interest were due, or to demand payment thereof. The said sums were paid by the defender in error, and they formed in truth prepayments to account of the amount of the said valuation ; and the defender is now entitled to credit for the sums as paid to account of the total amount of the said valuation, with interest thereon from the respective dates of the said payments until 7th July 1876, as follows, viz. :—(In all £2766, 18s. 5d.)

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

The defenders added a plea to the effect that no interest was payable except on overdue instalments, and that the defenders having in reliance on the representations of the pursuers or their factor made overpayments of interest they were entitled to credit therefor.

By the same interlocutor by which the above amendments were added to the record the Court allowed a proof before answer to both parties “ of their respective averments in regard to the alleged payments of interest by the defender on the amount of the valuation of the plant and machinery after the date of the agreement libelled.”

The proof was taken by Lord Gifford on 11th June 1877, when the pursuers examined their factor as to the mode in which he kept the accounts. They also examined Mr Simpson, the valuator, who stated that when he made his valuation it was as a going concern ; that he knew nothing about the arrangement as to payment of the price, and could not therefore have had it in view. The defenders adduced no evidence, and the proof was reported.

Argued for the pursuers ;—Apart from the ordinary rule that interest was ex lege due upon sums of money until paid, unless the reverse was expressly stipulated, or the nature of the credit usually given suspended for some time, the actings of the parties under this contract clearly shewed what had been intended by them when the contract was entered into. Unless interest was payable upon the unpaid balance the lessee would not get the full value of his plant and machinery. He would suffer a loss of about £4500. The right given to the lessees to pay the full sum at any time pointed to this, that they might wish to do so to get rid of the payments of interest at the rate of five per cent. The lessees having themselves interpreted the contract as being one which involved payment of interest, were bound by that course of dealing, and were barred from now repudiating it.¹ But even assuming that interest was not due upon the balance of unpaid instalments the lessees were not now entitled to repetition of the sums which they alleged they had paid in error. There was no error in point of fact ; it was at least in point of law, and the maxim held good ignorantia juris non excusat.²

¹ Garthland's Trustees v. McDowall, May 26, 1820, F. C. ; Brown's Trustees v. Brown, March 3, 1830, 4 W. and S. App. Ca. 28 ; Darling v. Adamson, March 16, 1834, 12 Sh. 598 ; Edinburgh and Glasgow Union Canal Co. v. Carmichael, May 27, 1842, 1 Bell's App. Ca. 316, 15 Scot. Jur. 193 ; Ersk. Inst. iii. 79, 82 ; Bell's Com. i. 692-3.

² Sinclair v. Wilson, Dec. 7, 1830, 4 W. and S. App. Ca. 398.

Argued for the lessees ;—Interest was due ex lege upon a principal sum whenever it became due, but not upon sums which were not due. The instalments upon which interest was now claimed had not yet fallen due. The object of the provision allowing the lessees to pay up the full price at any time was to enable them to acquire the absolute property of the machinery and plant whenever they liked. In a question as to a contract of such a recent date as this the Court were not entitled to look at the actings of the parties under it. They were bound to construe the written contract, however ambiguous it might be. It ceased to be ambiguous the moment the Court construed it. The exception under which written contracts might be construed by light thrown on them by the actings of parties under them applied only to ancient documents.¹ This was a peculiarly favourable case for the lessees getting credit for the sums which they had overpaid. The overpayments had been made in error induced by the lessor—although presumably innocently—and the transaction was not a concluded one. Credit could be given for these sums in the course of the subsequent accounting between the parties.²

At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—No question has been raised in regard to any of the findings of the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor reclaimed against, except the first, by which the defenders are found not liable in payment of certain interest in the value of the pits, engines, machinery, and others referred to in the record ; and the question of interest which has been so raised by the reclaimers, and is now to be determined, appears to me to be one of nicety and difficulty.

The present conjoined actions have arisen in consequence of disputes having occurred between the parties in reference to implement of the following stipulation in the lease, and the payments due by the defenders under that stipulation (His Lordship read the clause of the lease quoted above). It appears that the yearly instalments of the value of the plant have been paid by the defenders the pursuers, and that interest was charged and paid on the other instalments at the rate of five per cent, not from the stipulated date of their becoming due, but from the date when possession of the colliery and plant was taken. But the defenders decline to proceed with payment of the other instalments on this footing, and now maintain that they are liable only in interest on the yearly instalments from the respective dates at which they are payable, in terms of the stipulation in the lease. In order that the statements of the parties in relation to this matter of interest might appear distinctly they were allowed to amend the record, which they have accordingly done. At the debate it was, on the one hand, contended on the part of the defenders that the interest as paid by them on the first instalments was calculated and paid from the date of their taking possession of the plant, in place of from the respective dates at which they were payable according to the stipulation in the lease, through ignorance and mistake ; while, on the other hand, it was contended for the pursuers that there was no ignorance or mistake in the matter, and that according to the true construction of the stipulation in the lease the defenders were and are liable in payment of interest exactly as it was made by them.

Two questions are thus raised for the determination of the Court,—1st, What is to be held to be the precise nature and extent of the defenders' liability in

No. 160.

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

¹ Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. i. 352 ; Taylor on Evidence, vol. ii. 1044.
² Dickson v. Halbert, Feb. 17, 1854, 16 D. 586, 26 Scot. Jur. 266 ; Cooper v. Phibba, May 31, 1867, L. R. 2 E. and L. App. 149 ; Stair i. 1, 7.

No. 160. regard to interest on the instalments, or, in other words, what is the true construction of the stipulation in the lease in regard to that matter? and, 2d, Supposing it to be held that the defenders' view of their liability according to the true construction of the lease is the sound one, are they, or are they not, entitled, on the ground of ignorance or mistake, or of the mutual mistake of both parties, to be restored against the erroneous payments which have been already made by them?

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

Now, in regard to the first of these questions I can, after full consideration, entertain no serious doubt. As a general rule it may be true, as was argued by the pursuers, that a party is, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, liable in interest, or recompense in some form, for the use he has had of money or money's worth; and that, in accordance with this rule, he might have been liable in interest on the value of the plant in question from the date he received possession and has had the use of it; but, in the circumstances of the present case, and having regard to the terms of the agreement between the parties on the subject, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that the general rule is inapplicable, and that the defenders neither were nor are liable in interest on the instalments referred to except from the respective dates at which they became due and payable in terms of the stipulation to that effect in the lease. It must, I think, be assumed that the very object of the parties in expressly stipulating, as they did, that the instalments should be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, and that they should "bear interest in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof at the rate of five per cent per annum," was to make it understood that no other interest was to be payable. I cannot think it admits of doubt that if the first instalment had been paid at Whitsunday 1872, being the first term of Whitsunday after the defenders obtained possession of the plant, the second instalment at the next Whitsunday, and so on till all the instalments were paid, that this would be punctual payment at the stipulated terms, and that no further or additional interest would be due. The only, or at any rate the only plausible ground, as it appears to me, on which the pursuers seemed to rest an argument in support of their contention that interest was due on the full value of the plant from the date when possession thereof was taken, besides additional interest on each instalment as it fell due, was the declaration at the end of the stipulations in the lease "that the lessees shall have power to pay up the whole sum at any earlier period when it may be convenient for them to do so." Although this does certainly appear at first sight to be a very singular declaration, and it may be doubtful what was its precise object, I find it impossible to hold that it was thereby intended to make the defenders liable in interest not from the dates at which the instalments became payable, but from the date when the plant was taken possession of. I cannot hold that the previous perfectly clear and distinct stipulation to the contrary, as I must hold it to be, should be rendered unmeaning and unintelligible for no other reason than that it subsequently contains an ambiguous, and, in some views that may be taken of it, inconsistent, declaration. I would rather be disposed to think the true meaning and effect of the declaration to be, not to alter in any respect what I hold to be the plain and obvious meaning of the express stipulation as to interest, but to enable the defenders, if they pleased, to pay up at once the whole value of the plant, under deduction or discount of what would otherwise in that way be paid by the pursuers in consequence of such prepayment. But it is unnecessary to go that length, or to suggest a reason which is not expressed by another declaration.

tion which immediately follows the power conferred on the tenants to pay up the whole value of the plant earlier than they would require if payment were made by yearly instalments, in these terms—"Declaring that while the second parties (the defenders) shall be entitled to the use and occupation of said pits, engines, machinery, houses, buildings, locomotives, waggons, and other plant, fixed and moveable, as before specified, the same shall not be transferred to them or become their property, but shall remain and continue to be the property of the first party (the pursuers) until the whole price and interest shall be paid, when the same shall become the absolute property of the second parties, but no sooner." The reason and object of what appears, at first sight, a strange and unaccountable power or privilege conferred on the tenants is thus explained. Till the whole price or value of the plant should be paid the property, so far at least as title to the subjects was concerned, remained with the landlord, exposed to his debts and the diligence of his creditors. It was therefore a matter of importance to the tenants to have the power of paying up the whole price at once, in place of by instalments extending over ten years, and thereby relieving themselves and their property from the risk to which they were exposed so long as such payment was not made.

No. 160.
July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

Then, as to the second question, whether, assuming that interest has, to an extent beyond what was legally due, been erroneously paid by the defenders to the pursuers on the first three instalments, are they entitled to repetition of such payments so far as they have been in excess, or to be otherwise restored against such excess?

It is certainly not in all circumstances that a claim for repetition of or restoration against an erroneous payment can be entertained; and it is all the more difficult to obtain such redress where the error into which the parties fell was more of the nature of one in law than of fact. It is certainly very difficult to hold that the defenders here were in ignorance of all the facts bearing on the matter. They could not have been ignorant of the stipulation in the lease to which they were parties, and by which their obligations regarding the plant, and especially their obligation as to payment of its value, principal and interest, was regulated. They may, however, have been under a mistake as to the true construction of the stipulation on the subject, and of their rights and duties under it; and the pursuers may also have been under a similar error. Are the defenders, then, entitled, in law or equity, to the redress they now ask?

The decisions on the subject of condictio indebiti are not, I think, of a uniform character; but it is not necessary to examine them all, or to endeavour to reconcile them, for I am disposed to think that the principles laid down in the cases of Cooper v. Phibbs, L. R. 2 Eng. and Irish App. 149, and Earl Beauchamp v. Vinn, L. R. 6 Eng. and Irish App. 223, as both were decided in the House of Lords, are sufficient to enable us satisfactorily to dispose of the present question. In the former of these cases it was stated by the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) that in the maxim ignorantia juris haud excusat, "jus is used in the sense of denoting general law—the ordinary law of the country. But when the word us is used in the sense of denoting a private right, that maxim has no application. Private right of ownership is matter of fact; it may be the result also of matter of law; but if the parties contract under a mutual mistake and misapprehension of their relative and respective rights the result is that the agreement is able to be set aside as having proceeded upon a common mistake." And in the other case, of Earl Beauchamp, it was held (1) that when making an agreement

No. 160. between two parties there has been a mutual mistake as to their rights, occasioning an injury to one of them, the rule of equity is in favour of interposing to grant relief ; (2) that the Court of equity will not, if such a ground for relief is clearly established, decline to grant relief merely because, on account of the circumstances which have intervened since the agreement was made, it may be difficult to restore the parties exactly to their original condition ; and (3) that the rule ignorantia juris neminem excusat applies where the alleged ignorance is that of a well-known rule of law, but not where it is of a matter of law arising upon the doubtful construction of a grant.

July 10, 1877.
 Baird's
 Trustees v.
 Baird and Co.

These principles are, I think, in accordance with the doctrine stated by Professor Bell in his Principles (section 531) under the head "Condictio indebiti," and supported by the authorities to which he there refers.

Applying these principles to the present case, I am disposed to think that the defenders are entitled to the relief they ask for. There can be no question that both parties here—the pursuers as well as the defenders—acted under mutual mistake, for it was conceded in argument that there had been no intention by either party to deceive the other. The pursuers in asking payment of the interest in the manner and to the extent they did, and the defenders in paying the interest as so asked, were under a mistaken impression as to their respective rights and duties. And it is also undoubted that injury has resulted to the defenders. So far, therefore, the present case is within the principles which have been referred to. And there is just as little doubt that the defenders are also within these principles as they relate to the true meaning and effect of the maxim ignorantia juris neminem excusat. It was not ignorance of any general or well-known rule of law which had misled them. It was a mistaken view of the legal construction of the somewhat ambiguous stipulation in the contract of lease—a matter which is only now cleared up by the Court. And, as remarked by Lord Chelmsford in Earl Beauchamp's case, "although when a certain construction has been put by a Court of law upon a deed it must be taken that the legal construction was clear, yet the ignorance before the decision of what was the true construction cannot be pressed to the extent of depriving a person of relief on the ground that he was bound himself to have known beforehand how the grant" (obligation) "must be construed." The ignorance or mistake is, indeed, all the more excusable on the part of the defenders in the present case, and their right to be restored against it is all the more equitable, in respect that it was in some degree induced by the conduct of the pursuers in sending them a state of debt made up on what must now be held, so far as the interest in question is concerned, an erroneous footing.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to relief from the consequences of the error they fell into in regard to the interest on the three first instalments of the price of the plant in question. And, fortunately, there need be no difficulty in giving this relief as the over-payments can be allowed for in the payments yet to be made.

LORD GIFFORD.—In common with Lord Ormidale I have found this case one of serious difficulty, but I have arrived at the same opinion as that now expressed by his Lordship, and substantially given effect to by the Lord Ordinary.

Previous to the year 1871 the late Robert Baird was proprietor of the lands of Limerigg and Wester Drumclair, and of the coal and minerals thereon. Up to Whitsunday 1871 Mr Robert Baird was himself in the personal occupation of the minerals, and worked them for his own behoof. On 1st July 1871, however, Mr Baird entered into a contract of lease in favour of his brother William Baird, and John Wotherspoon, who had been his manager in the working of his mines, whereby he let to them, as tenants thereof, the whole coal and minerals for nineteen years from the term of Whitsunday 1871—the 1st of July 1871 being the date of the lease. The mineral lease, as is usual in such circumstances, embraces a great variety of stipulations regarding the working of the minerals, the plant and machinery, and other matters connected therewith, and, inter alia, it contains stipulations whereby the tenants became bound to take over the implements and machinery, workmen's houses, and other buildings and plant, at a valuation to be fixed by Mr Alexander Simpson, mining engineer, Glasgow. These stipulations are really subsidiary contracts between the first and second parties; they form part of the mineral lease, and the whole must therefore be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining its true construction and meaning. The provisions relating to the machinery, fixtures, plant, &c., form really a contract of sale of that machinery and plant by the lessor to the lessees, whereby they were sold to the tenants at a price to be fixed by the valuator, which price should be payable at the terms and in the manner stipulated and agreed upon in the lease; and the important question is, does this price as fixed bear interest, and if so, from what terms and to what extent? Now, the first observation I wish to make is that the mineral lease, dated 1st July 1871, is the sole and only contract between the lessor and lessees, neither of whom have proposed to reduce it or set it aside in whole or in part, or as not setting forth truly the agreement of the contracting parties. We are not asked to reform the deed to use an English expression), to alter any of its clauses or provisions, or to vary its words in any way. We are only to read and consider the contract as it stands as embodying the sole contract between the parties, and we have merely to construe these terms and enforce them according to their present and true meaning and intent. I think it important to keep this strictly in view, but specially in reference to the proof which was led before answer, and with reference to certain receipts and documents which were founded on. To me it appears that a great part of the proof and documents have really no bearing at all upon the principal question at issue—I mean the question of the construction of the lease, and how far, according to the terms of the lease, interest is due on the amount of the valuation of the plant. I think this question can only be determined by construing the words of this lease, and by finding what is the true meaning of the contract which forms the written and sole agreement between the parties. I take, then, the words of the lease in reference to the sale of the plant and the payment of the price or amount of the valuation thereof, and I find that the contracting parties specially stipulate and agree that the price of the plant as ascertained by the valuation of a man of skill shall be paid to the lessor, not instantly or when the lessees get possession thereof, but that payment of the price shall be postponed, and shall be accepted of by the lessor in ten equal instalments extending over a period of ten years. The lease says so, and I do not think the words are capable of more than one construction. The words are—“The amount of said valuation to be payable by the second parties by ten equal instalments extending over a period of ten years.” Now, if the deed had stopped there I think these words by themselves would be conclusive against the claim which the landlord's representatives have presented for interest on the whole amount of the valuation from the date of the tenants' entry and of the lease. When a

No. 160.

July 10, 1877.

Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

No. 160. purchaser of goods or of any article or subject whatever at a specified or ascertained price is, by the express written terms of the bargain, allowed a certain credit or a certain time to pay the price, I think it follows that no interest is due, and that the purchaser shall have the advantage of retaining the price till the period of credit expires. It would be no advantage to a purchaser to get this credit if he had to pay interest; it might even be a disadvantage to pay five per cent interest, because he might be able to borrow or obtain money at a lower percentage. The rule that no interest is payable during the currency of the agreed-on credit unless expressly stipulated for holds good most certainly in ordinary sales of goods and in the ordinary dealings between a merchant and his customer. Thus, in ordinary sales of merchandise, where twelve months' credit is sometimes given, or where the price is made payable, as often happens, by bill or bills at three or six months, or at other currency, no interest is due or can be charged till the credit expires, or until the bills for the price fall due, and if the bills are punctually paid when due no interest can be demanded from the purchaser, who has had the use of the article purchased from the very first. No doubt it may be said that credit for ten years or repayment by ten yearly instalments is a very unusual credit, and we must therefore look very narrowly into the contract to see whether that was really intended by the parties. This is quite a just observation, and accordingly I do look very narrowly into the deed, but I find that this unusual credit is really stipulated for in the very words of the contract. I make no difference, and can apply no different rule of interpretation between a credit for ten years or payment of the price by ten yearly instalments, and a credit for ten months where the price is made payable by ten monthly instalments. The principle is the same whatever be the duration or extent of the agreed-on credit. If nothing is said about interest, then no interest runs till the agreed-on period of credit expires. But the contract of lease is not silent on the matter of interest. It goes on expressly to deal with the question of interest on the price of the plant, that is, on the amount of the valuation thereof, and fixes what interest shall be due. The words are—"Each of which instalments" (that is, each of which ten equal instalments of the amount of the valuation), "shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday, and shall bear interest" (that is, each instalment shall bear interest), "in case of failure of the payment thereof, at the rate of five per cent per annum." Now, when I find that it is provided that interest shall be paid on these instalments only in the event of their not being punctually paid at the stipulated annual terms, and nothing further is said about interest, the conclusion is irresistible that no further interest is due in case of their non-payment. Had the contracting parties intended that interest was to be due on the full price from the first, and apart altogether from the non-due payment of instalments, I think it would have been distinctly stated in the lease. I cannot insert a provision for payment of interest and make a bargain for the parties which they have not chosen to make for themselves.

The only answer to this was (and it was a very ingenious one, suggested first, I think, by your Lordship in the chair), that the ten instalments were themselves to embrace, each one of them, a proportion of the interest, or a proportion of the price and of the interest, as to make the ten instalments equal in amount. Now, I think it is a sufficient answer to this view that the lease itself fixes what the ten equal instalments are to be. Each instalment is one-tenth of the "amount of the valuation," not of the amount of the valuation with anything added ; and to add interest to each instalment is to do something not warranted by the deed. It is the "amount" of the valuation, and that amount alone, which is to be paid by ten equal instalments. Then it is a somewhat difficult conclusion to combine interest and principal so as to make ten equal instalments of both. No doubt such a calculation might be made, but can we infer that such a calculation is to be made from the lease itself? I am quite unable to do so, even giving effect to considerations of equity. Ten equal instalments on the whole amount of the valuation are easily fixed. The valuation we have before us amounts to £19,000 and some odd hundreds of pounds, and each instalment is equivalent to a tenth of that sum. If these instalments were to be increased by past-due interest that would make the instalments unequal, and that would be contrary to the deed. And, really, if it was intended that the amount of valuation should bear interest from the beginning it was easy to say so, and there was no reason whatever for an intricate calculation to make the instalments equal in amount. I do not think, nor does it appear, that the colliery proprietors ever made a calculation to bring out the ten equal instalments, each compounded partly of capital and partly of interest. Suppose the bargain had been that bills should be granted for the amount of the valuation, as in the case of a debt payable by instalments at one, two, three, or ten years' currency, or suppose a bond had been granted for the ten instalments binding the tenants, and by a cautioner binding himself, for payment of the amount of the valuation by ten equal instalments payable in ten years, could it have been held that, besides the amount in the bond or in the bills, interest was running all that ten years on the capital sum? That might have been—I am not sure that it was not—the original idea of the lessor. It seems it was the idea of his agent, for he acted on it, but it is not expressed in the lease, and I do not think we can give it effect. For I think this lease virtually embraces stipulations which are equivalent to a bond or bills for the ten equal instalments of the amount of the valuation of the plant, without any cautioner, which amount of valuation was payable at Whitsunday yearly, and extended over ten years. I cannot add anything to that. I cannot make a bargain for the parties which they have not chosen to make for themselves, and therefore I think that the fair interpretation of the deed is, that the ten equal instalments of the amount of the valuation are to be paid without interest. Still further, if the instalments were to include interest, as suggested in argument, then the stipulation for interest upon overdue instalments must mean interest upon interest, and I do not think that is the case. A stipulation for compound interest, though it may be lawful, is never to be presumed, and must be very explicit indeed, and where there is only one stipulation for interest, and nothing said about compound interest, I cannot hold compound interest to be due. It was said that the actual payment of interest for three years might enable us to construe the meaning of the contract so as to read in the deed a different meaning from that which the deed taken by itself bears. I cannot possibly give such effect to the payment of interest for three years. No doubt, I must look to the position in which the parties stood when they entered into the contract. I must take into consideration the circumstances in which the parties stood at the date of the contract, which was 1st July 1871, and I think the actings of the parties after that date, even if they had been much stronger than they were, could not give a different meaning to the contract from that which it had at its date. But I do not think the payment of interest for three years alters the construction which I think should

No. 160.

July 10, 1877.

Baird's

Trustees v.

Baird and Co.

No. 160. be put upon the lease itself, and therefore I hold that, according to the terms of the mineral lease itself, read in the light of the whole surrounding circumstances, the lessor is not entitled to any interest on the yearly instalments of the valuation of plant, &c., unless and until these yearly instalments fall into arrear, and then the interest clause of the deed will come into effect.

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

It was strongly urged that this interpretation of the contract of lease is inequitable and unjust, as it gives the tenants the use of the plant from their term of entry downwards without paying anything for the use thereof, at least until the instalments fall due. But the first answer is, that if parties make a clear written agreement in certain terms, or in terms which have a certain legal effect, the Court cannot inquire into the equity of the bargain, and cannot estimate the relative value of the stipulations hinc inde. The written bargain must be carried out. But, apart from this, it appears to me that no want of equity is apparent. I cannot tell what compensatory effects the other clauses of the lease may produce. The rent or lordship may have been made higher just because the use of the plant was to be given without interest till the instalments fell due, or the other obligations on the lessees may have been made more onerous just because they got some advantage in a gratuitous or partially gratuitous use of the plant. Again, it appears that the plant in question was valued, not as upon a sale for removal, but as plant to be used in a going colliery, so that the amount of valuation was much greater, perhaps twice as great, as would have been realised at a breaking-up sale. It may very well be that in consideration of this enhanced price the payment of the instalments were deferred, and so to subject the lessees in payment of interest before the instalments fell due would or might very probably deprive the lessees of a benefit for which they may very probably have expressly stipulated. In every point of view, therefore, I find myself bound to follow strictly the very words of the contract, without adding or inserting anything whatever.

The only remaining point is, whether the landlord's representatives are bound to repay or to give credit for the three sums of interest which the lessees (if my interpretation of the deed is correct) have erroneously paid? Now, on this point I agree entirely with Lord Ormisdale. The moment the true meaning and effect of the contract of lease is fixed and ascertained then everything erroneously paid in excess of what is truly and legally due must either be repaid or must be allowed credit for in the current accounting for rents and lordships. Everything is open; the instalments are only in course of being paid. The rents and lordships are accruing termly, and nothing has occurred to bar either of the parties from insisting that the accounting between them shall be adjusted, and that their rights shall be fixed and given effect to in terms of the contract of lease, as these terms shall now be judicially interpreted.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I could come to the conclusion that the true meaning of this contract was that the defenders were not bound to pay to the pursuer the value of the machinery, but only a part of it, and that the agreement to take the amount by instalments imported not only delay in payment but an abatement from the price, I should concur in the proposed judgment. But I think the contract bound the defenders to pay the whole price, and that the stipulation that payment should be taken by instalments was only an ease to the defenders (and it was a great one) in point of time.

It is unnecessary to say anything about rules of interpretation, for none are involved here excepting two of the most elementary—First, that the Court are No. 160.

 entitled, in reading this contract, to be placed in the position of the parties to it, by ascertaining the surrounding circumstances; and, secondly, that the best exposition of doubtful expressions in a mercantile contract is the manner in which July 10, 1877.
 the persons who used them carried them into effect. But as I read the contract ^{Baird's} it contains no ambiguous words, nor any uncertain provisions requiring ex-
 Trustees v.
 Baird and Co.

The real nature and substance of the contract may be very shortly stated. In this lease Robert Baird let the coal-field to the defenders for nineteen years, the tenants being bound to pay to the lessor a fixed rent or a lordship, and being bound to purchase the machinery and plant at a valuation to be fixed by a man of skill. But in order to enable the tenants to provide so large a sum the lessor agreed to postpone the payment of the present value, and to spread the amount, by annual instalments, over ten years. The amount of the instalments is not fixed, but materials are to be furnished by the valuation to be made by the arbiter. As possession of the machinery was given immediately, and the tenant was to have the profit of it from the first, it followed that the price bore interest from the same date, unless there were a stipulation to the contrary, and, as a necessary consequence, that each of the ten annual instalments included interest as well as principal, the object being that the ten instalments should, when all paid, be equivalent to the present payment of the stipulated price. This could not be accomplished on any other footing. If I lend £1000, or sell a house for £1000, making payment or giving possession immediately, but stipulating that the price shall be paid by ten yearly instalments, that contract will not be fulfilled by the borrower or purchaser paying ten instalments of £100 each, for that would leave the creditor with little more than two-thirds of his debt. I do not go into calculations, but it is one of the most simple problems in a very simple and ordinary transaction. When a debt, certain in amount and instantly due, is stipulated to be paid by instalments, such and must be the meaning of the contract.

It needs little arithmetic to shew that the same numerical amount paid by annual instalments is of less value to the creditor than a present payment, and therefore that the sum which represents the value of the machinery when paid once will not represent it when spread over ten yearly instalments. The simplest illustration of this, which seems to be self-evident, may be gathered from the familiar practice under Government loans for drainage and other improvements. The Government advance a capital sum, to be repaid by instalments in twenty-two years. That means, that at the end of twenty-two years the Government will have received an amount equivalent to the value of the sum advanced as at the date of the loan. Now, this will not and can not be done by splitting up the capital sum into twenty-two instalments, but, assuming that the loan is at three per cent, a sum equal to six and a-half per cent on the capital is paid for twenty-two years, and these instalments, compounded of principal and interest, will, when paid, leave the Government as they would have been had the loan not been made.

Now, if that were the substance of the contract, let us examine the written instrument and see if it be susceptible of any other construction, and if it be in all its parts entirely consistent with it.

First, there is the obligation to pay the value of the property sold. What is the nominal expression of the price may be, it is to represent the present

No. 160. value of the articles sold and delivered, and that value, whatever the period of payment may be, is to be made good to the seller, and therefore the primary obligation of the purchaser is to pay, in one way or other, the present value of the thing sold.

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

The sum so fixed is to be paid by ten annual instalments of equal amount. Therefore the instalments must be of such an amount as will, together, be equivalent to the present payment of the price. The contract does not specify the amount, and it could not, as the present value had not been ascertained; but it does say explicitly that the whole value of the machinery is to be paid in that way, and the value could only be made good to the creditor by including in the instalments the interest which a present payment would have given him.

But it would not follow as matter of necessity that interest would run on unpaid instalments compounded of capital and interest, because that would be to accumulate interest on interest. Therefore the contract quite consistently provides the "amount of such valuation to be payable by the second parties by ten equal instalments, extending over a period of ten years, each of which instalments shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, and shall bear interest, in the case of failure in the punctual payment thereof, at the rate of five per centum per annum on the amount which may remain due until payment." The provision is not only consistent with what precedes it, but shows that the writer of the deed had fully in view the rule that interest on interest will not be presumed unless made the subject of express stipulation. Then follows a clause which well illustrates the construction I have suggested. It provides—"But the lessees shall have power to pay up the whole sum at any earlier period," &c. Now, if the lessees had volunteered to pay up the price before the first instalment became due what would they have had to pay? Clearly the whole amount of the valuation. They are to pay "the whole sum," and nothing less. But the "whole sum" was to be the sum found due by the arbiter; and this could never have been inserted as a privilege to the tenant except on the footing that the landlord was to draw at least as much, if the instalments ran on to the end of the ten years. The clause seems to be quite conclusive against the notion that the tenant was to retain the whole accruing interest if he did not elect to pay up, and was only to be allowed as a privilege to pay the whole amount. But this is made still clearer by the succeeding words of the agreement—"Declaring that while the second parties shall be entitled to the use and occupation of said pits, engines, machinery, houses, buildings, locomotive-waggons, and other plant, fixed and moveable, as before specified, the same shall not be transferred to them or become their property, but shall remain and continue to be the property of the first party until the whole price and interest thereof shall be paid, when the same shall become the absolute property of the second parties, but no sooner." Nothing can be more explicit. The object of this clause was plainly to create in the landlord a certain security over the plant, although delivered, while the instalments were current and unpaid. The effect of it may be doubtful. It may be questioned whether the landlord could in any way have asserted this right while the instalments were current, or maintained his security against the creditors of the tenant. But, be this as it may, the concluding words seem to leave no doubt remaining. The property is not to pass when the whole price—that is, the value of the plant—"and interest thereon, shall be paid." That was the condition on which alone the tenant was to become absolute owner, and the condition also on which the delay was given.

In all this there is really nothing which requires construction. Granted that the present value was to be made good to the seller, the words of the contract seem to admit of no other signification.

No. 160.

July 10, 1877.

Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

But let us see what followed on the contract, for, as I have said, the manner in which the provisions of it were carried out is the best interpreter of what the parties meant by it. The first thing which was done was that the arbiter valued the machinery, as for a present payment, at £19,000. This would have been resumed, but the matter is put beyond doubt by his own evidence. He swears he knew nothing about the period of payment, but simply fixed its present value as for a going concern. It was quite competent, indeed essential, to clear this up by evidence, and the fact admits of no doubt. It follows that a present payment of £19,000 was the capital on which interest was to be calculated, and the data were thus furnished for determining the amount of the annual instalments.

This being so, the contract was acted on for three years entirely on the footing we have described. The accounts were rendered annually for the instalments as they fell due, including the interest, and they were duly paid. Whether the mode of charging the instalments was altogether artistic is another matter, but the question has been raised on that head. Then the payments fell in arrear, and an action was raised to recover them, and even in the defences to that action no plea was taken that the interest had been surrendered. It was not till the supplementary action was raised that at last it was suggested by the defenders' advisers, what never had occurred to the man who made the contract, that by the terms of the written instrument the interest had been foregone. That is the plea which your Lordships propose to sustain. I am of opinion that it is unfounded, for the following reasons :—

First, There are no words in the instrument which admit of such a construction, unless the provision that the price was to be paid by instalments necessarily implies it. I have endeavoured to shew that it means the reverse.

Secondly, The view that the purchaser was not to pay the price, but only a proportion on it, is wholly inconsistent with the distinct obligation to pay the price of the machinery.

Third, The provisions in regard to the option by the purchaser to pay up the price, and the condition on which he was to acquire the property, exclude absolutely the plea contended for. The words are quite precise, and can mean nothing else but a payment of the full price and the whole interest due. To interpolate into this provision words which are not true, and which were, as I think, never intended to be true, I should hold to be entirely inadmissible.

Fourth, It is clear that the tenant, who knew what his contract was, never supposed that it gave him a gift of the interest, because he paid it without objection for three years.

Fifthly, The defender did not venture to appear as a witness in the proof, and that he was under any error in making these payments; from which I infer that he was conscious he was not. The only error he could have committed was an erroneous reading of the agreement, and if he had alleged that he had proved conclusively that he read the contract as his brother did.

As to the question of repetition, if the considerations I have mentioned do not avail, as they will not avail, to establish the nature of the contract, I am of opinion that there is here no proper case of condictio indebiti—a payment in

If the interest is not due there is only an overpayment to account, which

No. 160. may be adjusted on the subsequent instalments. If, indeed, the instalments had been paid up with or without interest, I should have held it incompetent for either party to have reopened the accounting on any such ground, seeing that both must have been aware of the true nature of their contract. But while they are current it is a matter of accounting merely, and although overpayments might not have been recovered back had the account been concluded, it is not, I think, incompetent to hold them as payments in account while there are future payments still to become due. The true effect to be given to these payments is to hold them as conclusive, as I think they are, of what the contract truly was. But if they have not this effect I cannot see that the pursuers can refuse to give credit for them.

July 10, 1877.
Baird's
Trustees v.
Baird and Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of, so far as it finds that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in the interest charged on the amount unpaid of the valuation of the pit, engines, machinery, and plant. As far as the instalments stipulated for in the lease were not in arrear and past due, and to this extent refuse the reclaiming note. Quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor: Further, find that in fixing the amount of rents and lordships now due by the defenders to the pursuers the defenders are entitled to credit for the three sums of interest paid by them on the unpaid amount of said valuation, the instalments of which were not in arrear, but where sums of interest were erroneously paid in 1872, 1873, and 1874 and that as at the dates at which the said three sums of interest were paid respectively; and with this finding remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein as may be just, reserving all questions of expenses, and decern: Grant power to the Lord Ordinary to deal with the whole questions of expenses, both in the Outer and Inner House, and to decern therefor."

D. & W. SHIRESS, S.S.C.—GEORGE BURN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 161. HUGH HENRY ROBERTSON AIKMAN (G. R. Aikman's Curator), Pursuer—Kinnear—Pearson.

July 10, 1877. THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—R. Johnston—Mackintosh.

Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Railway—Compensation for Lands and Injuries thereto.—A paid way-leave access to a railway over ground belonging to B. The railway company, in the exercise of compulsory powers, took a portion of B's ground to form a branch railway, to which A formed an access without using B's ground, and ceased to pay way-leave. Held that the loss of way-leave was not to be taken into account in fixing the compensation to be paid by the railway company for the land taken.

2D DIVISION. THIS action was raised by H. H. Robertson Aikman, curator to G. R. Robertson Aikman, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Ross, in the parish of Hamilton and county of Lanark, against the Caledonian Railway Company, and arose out of the following circumstances, which were admitted:—

Ld. Curriehill.
R.

The estate of Ross was bounded on the west by the estate of Haughhead, belonging to Mr Gardner. The Lesmahagow Junction Railway, belonging to the defenders, intersected part of the estate of Ross, but not at any point touch or pass through Haughhead. Access, therefore, from Haughhead to that railway could not be had except by passing over the lands of Ross. In 1861 Mr Gardner let the mine...

in Haughhead to Messrs Merry and Cunninghame, and in order to obtain access to the railway he and his mineral tenants entered into a contract of lease with the pursuer, as curator, whereby the latter let to them for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1861 (with breaks in the option of the tenants at the end of the fifth, tenth, and fifteenth years) whichever of two specified pieces of ground they might select on the estate of Ross, each extending to about an acre, for the purpose of forming thereon and using a private railway and lye from the said railway to the lands of Haughhead. By the lease it was agreed that the tenants should pay £150 per annum of fixed rent for the privilege of making and using such railway, or, in the option of the proprietor, certain lordships specified in the lease. Thereafter Mr Gardner and his mineral tenants constructed a line of railway from their pits at Haughhead to the defenders' railway, partly upon the piece of ground selected by them on the lands of Ross, and partly on the lands of Haughhead. The line so formed was used by Mr Gardner and his tenants for the transport of the Haughhead minerals, and for the way-leave over Ross they duly paid the stipulated lordships. The defenders, by the "Caledonian Railway (Lanarkshire and Mid-Lothian Branches) Act, 1866," acquired power to make a line of railway to connect their line at Hamilton with their Lesmahagow line, the junction to be formed at a point on the lands of Ross; and for the purposes of the said Act, and of a later Act, entitled the "Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872," they, by virtue of their statutory powers, took several portions of the lands of Ross, contiguous to Haughhead, extending in all to upwards of eleven acres. They also took sundry portions of the contiguous parts of Haughhead, and upon the ground so taken from the estates of Haughhead and Ross they constructed their new main line railway and certain other works. Mr Gardner was thus enabled to connect his own branch railway from his pits at Haughhead directly with the defenders' new railway, which passed through the ground taken from himself, without the necessity of passing through any part of the lands of Ross, or of using the private railway and lye which he and his mineral tenants had formed on the lands of Ross in virtue of their lease from the pursuer. And in 1876 they formed the connection by constructing, at their own expense, a line of railway from a point on their own original private line, within the lands of Haughhead, to the defenders' new line of railway, at a point within the ground taken by the defenders from the pursuer.

The amount of compensation due to the pursuer, as curator of the proprietor of Ross, having been referred to arbitration, in terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the pursuer expected that Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame would no longer require to make use of their way-leave over the estate of Ross, they would construct a new private railway on the lands of Haughhead, and would take advantage of the break which would occur at Whitsunday 1876, and terminate the lease as from that date. The pursuer accordingly maintained before the arbiters that he was entitled to compensation from the defenders for the loss of profit under the lease, occasioned by the defenders having constructed, partly upon the lands taken from him and partly upon Haughhead, a line of railway which would enable his tenants to reach Lesmahagow Railway without passing over the ground let to them by lease. The arbiters held that it was not within their competence to decide whether the pursuer was entitled to compensation on this account. It was thereupon agreed that the arbiters should be requested to fix the amount of compensation which would be payable to the pursuer in the event of its being found that the loss of profit which he derived from the

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.

Aikman v.

Caledonian

Railway Co.

No. 161. way-leave ought to be taken into computation in fixing the amount of compensation due to him for the ground taken by the defenders. The arbiters accordingly pronounced a decree-arbital, dated 3d and 10th July 10, 1877. Aikman v. Caledonian Railway Co. November 1875, the material part of which was as follows:—“(1) We do hereby find, fix, and determine the amount of purchase-money and compensation to be paid to the said Hugh Henry Robertson Aikman, as curator foresaid, in full of all his claims as aforesaid, with the exception of that for deprivation of way-leave after referred to, at the sum of £3600; and (2) with regard to the claim for deprivation of way-leave, we find that it is a legal question, and one which it is not competent for us to decide, whether, under the said ‘Lands Clauses Act,’ the claimant is entitled to compensation in respect thereof at all; but at the request of, and in terms of the arrangement made by the parties, we find that, in the event of the claim being held good by the Court, the sum to be paid should be £2370.”

On 11th November 1875, the day after the date of the decree-arbital, Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame gave notice to the pursuer that they would take advantage of the break in their lease at Whitsunday 1876, and declared the lease at an end as from that date.

In October 1876 the pursuer raised the present action for the purpose of having the claim for the sum of £2370 declared good and enforced.

He pleaded;—(1) The loss of profit derivable from the aforesaid way-leave ought to be taken into computation in fixing the compensation due to the pursuer for the land taken by the defenders, in respect that part of the value to the pursuer of the ground so taken by the defenders consisted in the circumstance that a way-leave through the pursuer's estate was necessary to the proprietor and mineral tenants of Haughhead, and that the pursuer has been deprived of the said profit by reason of the defenders having taken the said ground. (2) The amount of compensation due to the pursuer, as curator foresaid, in respect of the said loss of profit, having been fixed by the arbiters at £2370, the pursuer is entitled to decree the payment thereof, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders denied liability, and, inter alia, pleaded;—(2) The prospective and contingent loss to the pursuer through Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame's renunciation of their lease does not constitute damage for which the defenders are liable to make compensation either under the “Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,” or any other Act, or at common law.

The Lord Ordinary, on 29th December 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Assolizes the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses,” &c.*

* “NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts, the substance of which has been given above)—The legal ground on which the pursuer bases his claim for compensation for deprivation of the foresaid way-leave is ‘that part of the value to the pursuer of the ground so taken by the defenders consisted in the circumstance that a way-leave through the pursuer's estate was necessary to the proprietor and mineral tenants of Haughhead, and that the pursuer has been deprived of the said profit by reason of the defenders having taken the said ground. Now, it is not pretended that any part of the ground leased by the pursuer Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame has been taken or used by the defenders under their statutory powers, or that any direct damage by occupation, obstruction, injury to access, or in any other way, has been done to the said ground by the execution of the works authorised by the Acts of 1866 and 1875, and executed by them upon the ground acquired by them in virtue of the Acts; and it is not disputed that the new railway by which the Haughhead minerals are brought into connection with the defenders' system of railway has

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer ;—Throughout the decisions a clear distinction

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.

Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

been constructed by Mr Gardner and his mineral tenants, and not by the defenders, and that it had not been constructed at the date of the decree-arbital. And it is only in consequence of the recent construction by Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame of that new private railway that the use of the way-leave over the pursuer's lands of Ross has become unnecessary, and that the lease thereof has been given up by them in terms of the absolute and unconditional power to do so conferred on them by the lease. And the question now to be solved is, whether, in these circumstances, the loss of the way-leave, which at the date of the decree-arbital was only prospective and contingent, constituted damage to the pursuer's lands, for which he is entitled to compensation from the defenders. I am of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

"It appears to me that the connection between the compulsory purchase of the portion of Ross in question, and the construction and execution of the authorised works thereon by the defenders on the one hand, and the cessation of the pursuer's income from a way-leave over another part of this estate, is too remote to entitle the pursuer to compensation for such loss. In the first place, it is not the execution of any works by the defenders, either on the land taken from the pursuer or on adjacent land, which has brought the use of the way-leave to an end; it is the construction by Mr Gardner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame of a private railway on their own lands, and the voluntary exercise by these parties of their absolute right to declare the lease at an end at Whitsunday 1876 which have directly brought about this result. And, in the second place, the formation by the defenders of works on the land taken by them from the pursuer has not injured the pursuer's lands of Ross in any other sense than this, that the tenants of a portion of the estate of Ross, who got access to the defenders' railway by paying a way-leave to the pursuer, can now get access directly from their own land to the defenders' line. This, I think, is not loss for which the pursuer is entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. It is not loss or damage for which compensation could have been claimed at common law; and it cannot be regarded as anything more than loss or damage arising from the legitimate use of the defenders' railway after it has been made, and for such loss no compensation can be given under the statutes. The law on this matter appears to have been settled by judgments of the House of Lords in two cases involving the construction of the English 'Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,' which, as regards compensation, is expressed in language similar to that of the Scottish Act—See Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, Feb. 1867, L. R. 2 E. and I. App. 175, and Hammersmith and City Railway Company v. Brand, July 1869, L. R. 4 E. and I. App. 171. And these cases were referred to by the Lord Chancellor (Hatherley) and Lord Helmshurst as settling the law in deciding a case from Scotland, viz., The City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter, 30th June 1870, 8 Macph. R. L. 156. Their Lordships held that the injury to be done to lands in the exercise of their statutory powers by a railway company, and referred to in the 4th and 61st sections of the 'Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,' means injury to be done by the execution of the works referred to in sec. 17, and not injury caused by the use of the railway when made. And although Lord Westbury expressed his dissent from the general view of the statute taken by their Lordships, and his disapproval of the judgment in the cases of Ricket and of Brand, he said, 'with these limitations I concur in this, that what is the result of the legitimate uses of the railway cannot be made the subject of a claim of compensation after the railway has been made. Whatever is done by the company in pursuance of their powers, and done without neglect and without an excess of their authority, is a legitimate consequence of the statutory enactments, and cannot be considered as doing an injury to any one.' Now, what the railway company has here done is to construct a railway on the land taken from the pursuer, and to permit—what, indeed, they could not have refused—a connection

No. 161. had been recognised between cases in which a person claimed damages, no part of whose land had been taken, and cases relating to the mode in

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

to be made between their railway and a private line made by an adjoining proprietor on his own land; and if by the use of such connection the way-leave over the pursuer's land is no longer necessary to that adjoining proprietor, I do not see what 'injury,' in the sense of the statute, has been done to the pursuer.

"But farther, it is, in my opinion, not necessary to take such a narrow view of the case, as to decide it upon the somewhat strict view of the statutes on which the judgments in the cases referred to were pronounced. The simple and natural construction of the 'Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' upon which the pursuer's claim rests, leads to the same result. That Act provides (sec. 19) in the case of the purchase of lands otherwise than by agreement, that compensation is to be given for the lands taken, and 'for any damage that may be sustained by reason of the execution of the works.' And by sec. 61 it is enacted that 'in estimating the purchase money or compensation to be paid by the promoters of the undertaking in any of the cases aforesaid regard should be had not only to the value of the land to be purchased or taken by the promoters of the undertaking, but also to the damage, if any, to be sustained by the owner of the lands by reason of the severance of land taken from the other land of the owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such land by the exercise of the powers of this or the special Act, or any other Act incorporated therewith.' Now, even assuming that the injury for which compensation is to be awarded is not limited, as the recent judgments of the House of Lords would seem to imply, to loss or injury caused by the execution of the works, but includes injury arising from the use of the works after they have been made, it appears to me that the lands of the pursuer cannot be said to have been injuriously affected, or, as Lord Westbury calls it, 'damnously affected,' by the exercise of the defenders' statutory powers, so as to entitle the pursuer to compensation. If any loss has accrued, or is likely to accrue, to the pursuer through the construction of the defenders' new line of railway, that loss is much too indirectly consequential to entitle the pursuer to compensation. No loss had accrued at the date of the decree-arbital fixing the compensation. The alleged damage was then entirely prospective and contingent; it depended upon two things, (1) upon the pursuer's tenants availing themselves of the option given to them in the lease of the way-leave, and declaring the lease at an end as at Whitsunday 1876; and (2) upon Mr Gardner constructing the private line of railway on his own land between his pit at Haughhead and the defenders' new line of railway. I think it is impossible to say that the necessary and inevitable result of the exercise of the defenders' statutory powers was either to lead to the abandonment of the way-leave, or to the construction of the private line over Haughhead by other persons with whom the defenders were in no way connected, and over whom they had no control.

"All that the defenders, up to the date of the decree-arbital, had done in the exercise of their statutory powers upon the lands taken from the pursuer was to construct a line of railway so convenient for the district that it was possible, if not probable, that Mr Gardner, the proprietor of the adjacent lands of Haughhead, and his mineral tenants, might find it more profitable to construct a private line of their own than to continue to use the way-leave over the lands of the pursuer. But even if the arbiters had been satisfied that Mr Gardner and his tenants intended to avail themselves of their statutory right to construct such a railway, and of their right to declare the lease at an end as at Whitsunday 1876, without assigning any reasons, which right had been stipulated for by them, and agreed to by the pursuer at the commencement of the lease, the loss of the way-leave occasioned could not, in my opinion, have been competently dealt with by the arbiters as an injury to the pursuer's lands occasioned by the defenders' exercise of their statutory powers. The arbiters would therefore, in my opinion, have exceeded their powers if they had found the pursuer entitled to compensation for such loss, in anticipation of the tenants of the way-leave availing themselves of the break in the lease. The exercise of their statutory powers by the defenders has in no way injured the solum of the ground over which the way-leave extended;

which compensation was to be estimated to a person whose land had been taken. The question in the latter class of cases was not properly one of damage; it was one of value. The statute contemplated that when land was taken compulsorily the owner should get not merely the separate value of the land taken but what the land was worth to him. It was important, therefore, to see what use he was making or was likely to make of the land—whether he was likely to use it for feuing, building, or other purposes. That let in the consideration of indirect advantages, and most reasonably, because these were just the things which would be taken into consideration in making a private sale. It was a fair criterion to take into account what a willing seller would reasonably take into account. The Legislature did not intend to put a seller who was obliged to sell in worse position than a willing seller. The land in question was a source of income to the pursuer, because, being interjected between the railway and the coalpits of Messrs Merry and Cunninghame, the latter were obliged to take a way-leave. As soon as a part of the land was taken by the defenders it was clear from the position of the properties that the pursuer's income would cease. The loss of the way-leave rent was the direct and immediate consequence of the construction of the railway, and herein the case differed from that of the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter,¹ in which the injury did not arise from anything done on the ground taken by the railway from the claimant, and might equally well have been made the subject of a claim by any other person in the neighbourhood. True, the pursuer's income might cease from other causes; but in a question like the present one must judge upon reasonable probabilities. If the defenders had left the land alone it was to be expected that the way-leave would continue to be taken. It was beside the point to argue that the advantage was a precarious one, and might have been lost in other ways. That was a mere question of amount. All pecuniary interests were liable to various risks, and these were proper considerations for the arbiters to take into account. But when the arbiters had taken these contingencies into account, and fixed the value, it was unreasonable to say that the pursuer was not to recover what the arbiters had fixed because of these contingencies. The principles contended for by the defenders, that no claim for damage could arise, unless that damage could have been made the subject of an action if the company had proceeded without statutory powers, and that no compensation was due unless the injury arose from the construction of the railway, and not out of subsequent use, were both inapplicable to the case where the injury was done on ground taken from the claimant. If, without having obtained an Act, the defenders had come to the pursuer and asked him voluntarily to sell the piece of ground in question, it may fairly be supposed, even if he were a willing vendor, that he would have fixed a price which would represent the actual loss and damage to him, including the loss of the way-leave. The possession of the land would have enabled the pursuer to make his bargain with the defenders. It was in accord-

No. 161.
July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

as not damaged it by severance, or in respect of amenity, or obstructed the access to it, or prevented it in any way from being used, either as a private railway, or for any other lawful purpose. If affected by the exercise of the defenders' statutory powers at all, it is merely in consequence of a third party having been enabled to construct a competing private line of railway; and I can find neither principle nor authority for holding that, for any loss so occasioned, the pursuer is entitled to compensation from the defenders."

City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Hunter, June 30, 1870, 8 Macph. 156, L. R. 2 Scot. App. 78.

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

ance with reason and equity, that as the statute took away from the proprietor the option of refusing to part with his land, it should place him as far as possible in the same position, to the extent at least of giving him reasonable indemnification for the loss actually sustained by the taking of the land. These principles were clearly laid down by Mr Justice Crompton in the case of the Stockport Railway Company, 33 L. J. Q. B. 251, and although in some subsequent English cases some doubts as to their soundness had been thrown out, they had received the sanction of the House of Lords in the recent case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works. Any dicta in the previous cases of Rickett and Brand, which might be founded on in a contrary sense, must be held as overruled by the decision in the Duke of Buccleuch's case. In the case of Reg. v. Cambrian Railway Company, May, 3, 1871, L. R. 6 Q. B. 422, where a railway had been empowered to construct across a river a railway bridge and footway for passengers in the neighbourhood of a ferry, the owner of the ferry was held entitled to compensation, although the railway in no way obstructed the ferry or approaches to it. It was not, therefore, necessary that there should be physical interference with the right injuriously affected.¹

Argued for the defenders;—The sum claimed was really in respect of land which had not been taken, viz. the land over which the way-leave extended. Compensation was excluded by two well settled rules—first, that compensation could only be recovered where the injury was such that but for its being legalised by statute it would have grounded an action at law; and second, that to entitle a person to compensation the injury complained of must be one arising out of the original construction and not out of the subsequent use of the railway. In the present case the loss sustained by the pursuer was not even occasioned by the defenders, but by other parties, viz. the lessees of the Haughhead minerals taking the legitimate use of the railway after it was made. Although a part of the pursuer's lands had been taken, there was no connection of cause and effect between the taking of that part of the lands and the loss of the way-leave; at least the connection was too remote and indirect to found a claim against the defenders. The way-leave would equally have been lost if another railway had passed on the other side of the Haughhead estate without touching the lands of Ross, and in many other contingencies which might be figured, and which could not possibly give rise to any claim by the pursuer against the defenders. The case was therefore ruled by that of City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter. The case of Reg. v. Cambrian Railway Company founded on by the pursuer was not in point. Compensation was there given in respect that the ferry was a hereditament within the definition of the Lands Clauses Act, which had been injuriously affected by the building of the bridge. A crown-granted ferry was a right of an essentially different character from a mere accidental monopoly created by the situation of a property relative to an existing railway. The pursuer was in much the same position as the owner of a posting inn, a corner of whose garden had been taken by a railway. It could not be contended that this would entitle the owner to compensation for loss of profits on posting caused by the diversion of traffic by the railway.²

¹ Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, April 30, 1872, L. R. 5 E. and I. App. 418; in re Stockport, &c. Railway Co., May 1864, 33 L. J. Q. B. 251; Jubb v. Hull Dock Co., 1846, 9 Q. B. 443; Bourne v. Mayor of Liverpool, June 24, 1863, 33 L. J. Q. B. 15; Metropolitan Board of Works v. McCarthy, June 1874, L. R. 7 E. and I. App. 243.

² Rickett v. Metropolitan Railway Co., Feb. 1867, L. R. 2 E. and I. App. 155.

At advising,—

No. 161.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the facts)—This is no doubt a hard case on the pursuer, for if the branch line had not been made he would probably have been the richer by £150 a-year. But I have come to a very clear conclusion that this claim has no ground whatever on which to rest. July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

I have gone carefully through the authorities quoted to us. They are not as consistent or satisfactory as might be desired, and even in the last of them in the Court of last resort, that of M'Carthy,¹ jurists of the highest authority do not seem altogether agreed as to the principle on which such cases should rest. I forbear, however, any analysis of them, because I am very decidedly of opinion that the present claim stands outside of any principle of compensation which has ever been recognised.

It is not said by the claimant that the lands themselves have been injuriously affected in any way whatever. He does not complain of severance, or loss of access, or even of general deterioration in the market. None of these things have been done by the defenders, or if they have been done they have been allowed for. What he says is that one man, or firm, who before found it convenient to go through his land, and to pay him for the privilege, no longer finds it for his interest to do so, and has taken advantage of his legal right to put an end to his obligation.

It will be observed that this act which caused the damage was not the act of the railway company, but of the lessees of the way-leave, over whom the defenders had no control whatever. They had no power to compel the lessees to take advantage of the break in their lease, or to make the connecting line, nor could they have prevented their doing so. The whole matter is this, that the condition of the neighbourhood being altered, by no act of theirs, the lessees of the Haughhead Colliery, as members of the public, choose to use this new railway line, instead of going through the pursuer's ground. But with their determination the defenders have no concern. All the public may use their line, and they cannot object, and for the consequences of that use they cannot be responsible.

What the pursuer really complains of is that the defenders, by affording increased facilities for traffic, have furnished a motive to the lessees to break their lease and make the new connecting line. But that is what all railway facilities have done, and are intended to do. To affect property injuriously is one thing; to divert traffic from one district and take it to another is quite a different thing. The gain of the many is every day the indirect cause of the loss of one or of several. But this is the true end for which these increased powers are given, and it is in vain to attempt to place on the shoulders of those who afford these facilities the remote effects of the alterations in life which they produce.

Let us suppose that instead of the present case the pursuer had entered into lease with a grazier to pasture his cattle on their journey to a market. A railway comes through the pursuer's ground, and the grazier finds it more for his [Lammersmith and City Railway Co. v. Brand, July 13, 1869, L. R. 4 E. and I. pp. 171; City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Hunter, June 30, 1870, 8 Macph. H. L. 156, L. R. 2 Scot. App. 78; Deas on Railways, pp. 282, &c., and cases there cited.

¹ Metropolitan Board of Works v. M'Carthy, June 1874, L. R. 7 E. and I. pp. 243.

No. 161. advantage to send his cattle to a more distant station. Is the railway company to be liable to each landowner through whose ground the railway passes in every instance in which such things happen? These things are the voluntary acts of third parties, and all the part which the railway company has in them is that they have supplied a motive for the change.

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

But the present is a feeble case, even of the feeble class to which it belongs. It is not one in which the pursuer can allege any general loss of custom or depreciation in the land market. He only can say,—There is now one customer who will not employ me as he formerly did, and you have no right to take my land with that result without paying me the value of that custom. I have never heard of such a case. If loss of the good-will of a business, or general reputation in the feuing market, or elements of that kind, are admissible as objects for which compensation can be demanded—on which opinions differ—the interest involved must be a general one,—one affecting the community, or at least a district or neighbourhood. The present case is much the same as if a shopkeeper were to complain that a line of railway which cut off a corner of his ground enabled one customer to go to the county town instead of dealing with him. In short, the relation of cause and effect is entirely wanting here. The Caledonian Railway did not break this lease. It was the doing of the lessees themselves in the exercise of their legal right, and there are no grounds on which the defenders can be made responsible for the result.

LORD ORMIDALE.—(After a statement of the facts)—From the statement now given it will be observed that the defenders, the Caledonian Railway Company, who maintain that the pursuer's claim is not a good one, did not take any part of the ground over which the way-leave in question passed, or interfere directly with it in any way. And, it will also be observed, that the pursuer has been awarded to him by the arbiters the purchase-money and compensation to which he is entitled for the land actually taken from him. I think it must likewise be assumed, there being nothing said to the contrary, that the purchase-money and compensation so awarded comprehended all proper severance damages, if any, sustained by the pursuer. He does not, indeed, aver that his communications were interfered with, or that any severance damage was sustained by him in consequence of the defenders taking some ground from him, or in any other way. His claim now in dispute is for what is called "depreciation of way-leave" exclusively. And this claim is maintained by the pursuer on the ground not that the land over or through which the way-leave passes has been taken or interfered with by the defenders, but in consequence of his tenants, Mr Garner and Messrs Merry and Cunninghame, having brought their lease to an end as they were entitled to do, by taking advantage of a break in it. This is obviously a very indirect cause of damage in any view that can be taken of it as against the defenders, who were not parties to the lease, and neither broke it nor had the power of breaking it. They had no more to do with the breaking of the lease, and thereby depriving the pursuer of his way-leave rent, than any proprietor of lands in the neighbourhood could be supposed to have who merely allowed the pursuer's tenants to pass through his lands, and in that way enabled them to dispense with the way-leave they had from the pursuer.

But, then, no doubt, the defenders have taken, compulsorily taken, from the pursuer a portion of his lands, although not that portion over which the way-leave in question passes, and in this respect the case differs from that supposed.

of a neighbouring proprietor giving the necessary access over his lands to the tenants of the way-leave. But, does that circumstance render the defenders liable in compensation to the pursuer? It could not do so directly, because the lands over which the way-leave passes have not been taken or interfered with. It may be said, however, and it is here the only plausibility which the pursuer's claim has lies, that, independently of statutory compulsion enforced by the defenders, the pursuer, had he been applied to by a private individual to sell the portion of land which has been actually taken by the defenders, would have had it in his power either to have stipulated that no competing way-leave should be allowed through it, or, failing such stipulation, to have insisted for a price all the higher. This is true, but it does not follow that every claim for enhanced price that might be available in a private voluntary sale is competent or admissible in a statutory compulsory sale, any more than it is in the power of a proprietor to refuse in the latter case to part with any portion of his estate at all, although he could do so if he pleased in the former.

But while a party is not entitled, in respect of a compulsory sale to a railway company, to insist on every claim of damage (however induced), or compensation, however fanciful and extravagant, every fair and legitimate claim is secured to him. Accordingly, the arbiters in the present instance awarded to the pursuer the purchase-money or value of the lands actually taken from him; and it must also be borne in mind that in estimating the purchase-money or value so awarded to the pursuer the arbiters were entitled, and must be presumed, in the absence of any statement to the contrary, to have taken into their consideration all the capabilities of the ground taken,—for example, its building or feuing value, if it had any such. And they were, besides, entitled to add, and must be presumed to have added, in conformity with the universal practice in such cases, a considerable sum more in respect of the compulsory purchase.

In these circumstances, I am unable to see on what ground or principle the pursuer can be held to have right to the sum he now claims, or any claim at all, or deprivation of way-leave, as against the defenders. Such a claim as against them appears to me, in any fair view that can be taken of it, too remote and indirectly consequential to be sustained; and on this ground, were there no other, think the Lord Ordinary has rightly assoilzied the defenders.

But the same result must follow if the validity of the pursuer's claim is tried by the principle which has been recognised by the highest authorities, that a railway company is not answerable for consequences resulting to a party, not from the original formation of their line, but merely from its subsequent use, supposing that use to be legitimate in itself, and within the statutory powers of the company. That this is a sound principle appears to me to have been ruled by the House of Lords in, among other cases, the case of the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter.¹ Now, the pursuer does not say that the mere formation of the defenders' railway or the erection of the works caused any damage to him which entitles him to the sum in dispute by way of compensation. On the contrary, it is clear from the pursuer's own statements, that the injury for which his present claim is made has arisen from the use, perfectly legitimate in itself, which has been taken of the defenders' railway after its completion. But that cannot be made the foundation of a claim for compensation by the pursuer any more than the de-

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

¹ June 30, 1870, L. R., 2 Sc. App. 78, and 8 Macph., H. L. 156.

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

fenders could have been allowed to set off the advantages which their railway when made would be to the pursuer in extinction, pro tanto or wholly, of the compensation due to him for the purchase-money of land compulsorily taken from him. And to apply another test which has also been recognised by the House of Lords, viz., that the defenders, as a railway company, can only be made liable for doing what, but for their statutes, would have been actionable at law. This principle was given effect to by the House of Lords in the case of the Hammersmith and City Railway Company v. Brand,¹ and distinctly recognised as a sound one in the case of the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter already noticed. Accordingly, if the defenders had taken any land from the pursuer, or otherwise entered upon, or injuriously affected any property of his outwith or in excess of their statutory powers, they would be liable in an action at law just as any ordinary party; but nothing of the kind has in the present instance been done, or is said to have been done, by them. They have, on the shewing of the pursuer himself, acted in every respect within their powers, and accordingly they cannot be made responsible to the pursuer as maintained by him.

It was said, however, in the course of the argument for the pursuer, that the authority of the decisions to which I have referred has been displaced by the more recent judgment in the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. the Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R., 5 E. and L. App. 418, but after a careful examination of the report of that case I have been unable to find that this is so.

The result is, therefore, that, in my opinion, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against is well founded, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I think that the question in the present case, when divested of its specialties, really comes to be this: Is a landowner, a part of whose estate is taken under compulsory powers by a railway company, entitled to claim and receive from the company, not only the full value of the land taken, with damages for severance and for direct injury done to the adjoining land, but also to claim and receive compensation for the loss, injury, or destruction which may be occasioned to the traffic on a private road belonging to the landowner and situated on another part of his estate, by the facilities which the railway will afford when constructed? Perhaps the question may be put even more generally: Is a railway company ever bound to pay to the proprietors of roads, either public or private, in the district which it traverses, compensation for the loss of traffic which is working, when finished, may occasion on the pre-existing roads?

A right of way-leave, such as that belonging to the pursuer, however valuable, is simply a right to levy a rent or toll for the use of or for passage over a private road. The rent or way-leave may be exacted from one or more persons or companies, or it may, like a pontage, be payable by such of the general public who choose to avail themselves of the bridge or way, but it is always, and essentially, simply a toll or payment for the use of a road or bridge payable to the proprietors or proprietors thereof. Now, it is a very important and a very general question, whether a railway, which, when made and in operation, will probably or certainly injure, lessen, or destroy the traffic on pre-existing roads or bridges, is bound to pay compensation therefor—when, as in the present case, no part of the road or bridge itself is cut or physically interfered with or touched by the railway No. 161.

¹ July 13, 1869, L. R. 4 E. and L. App. 171.

itself?

I am disposed to answer this question in the negative, at least in the general case,—for probably exceptional cases may occur, and with these I do not deal. In general, I think I may say that a railway company is not bound to pay for the loss of traffic which its ultimate working, after being constructed, may occasion either to other railways, to canals, to public turnpike or other roads, or to private roads or bridges, the property of individuals or companies. The reason why the Legislature authorise the construction of a new line of railway is, that additional accommodation and means of carriage and communication is required by and will be beneficial to the neighbourhood, the public, or the nation, and therefore it is that compulsory powers are granted to the railway company to acquire the land needed for its undertaking. It is, of course, a condition of each acquisition that private and individual proprietors shall be compensated and paid for the land which the railway takes from them for a public purpose, and in reality the public through the railway company pay such compensation, but it was never contemplated that the railway company and through it the public or in one shape or other, in railway fares or otherwise, the public must pay for it—should make good as a condition of getting its new and improved road by railway all the traffic which formerly passed over the old and inconvenient ways, public or private, which were in use in the district. It was the very inconvenience, circuitousness, or expense of these old roads which made the new way necessary and expedient, and which induced the Legislature to authorise its construction and it would really deprive the public of all the advantages contemplated if it had not only to make and pay for in railway dues the new road or railway, but also to keep up the traffic on the old roads, or to pay for the old and superseded traffic as if it were still kept up.

Now, I think this principle is sufficient for the decision of the present case. The solum of the right of way or private road or railway belonging to the pursuer and situated on his estate has not been touched or taken or physically affected in any way by the railway company. The new railway does not touch it, but leaves it precisely as it was before. It may be used now and henceforth just as it was used before the new railway was made. All that the pursuer can say is that the new railway gives such facilities of traffic to the coalowners in the mineral field of Haughhead that instead of using the pursuer's private way, as they did before, they will now use the new railway to which they have direct access, without the pursuer's leave, and will accordingly terminate, as they have power to do, the use of way-leave which they formerly had from the pursuer. But this is just what may be said of every old road superseded by a new one. The old road will be deserted for the new and improved communication, and this is just what is intended. But it certainly does not follow that the public—for the public ultimately must pay through the railway company—is bound to pay the old tolls on the old roads, just as it did before, although it no longer uses these old roads.

The loss of traffic of which the pursuer complains is not the direct act of the railway company. It is not the railway company who have made the new siding on the Haughhead Colliery joining the new railway. This has been done by the coal company themselves in virtue of a statutory right conferred on the coal company or the mineral owner, and which they are entitled to exercise without

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

No. 161.

July 10, 1877.
Aikman v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

the consent and against the will of the railway company. It would seem rather hard that the railway company should be compelled to pay the pursuer for the consequences of what is not the act of the railway company, but the sole act of the pursuer's own tenants, over whom the railway company have no control. It can make no difference to the railway company whether the coal from Haughhead Colliery came upon the railway by the old way-leave railway or by the new siding. That is solely a matter of choice depending on the will of the coalowner and with which the railway cannot interfere, and yet it is because the coalowner chooses to get to the railway in his own way that the railway company is asked to pay the pursuer for the way-leave which the coalowner has chosen to abandon, and the right to abandon which the coalowner specially reserved to himself; for it is one of the conditions of the lease or contract of way-leave that it shall be terminable by the Haughhead coalowners at certain terms. It is difficult to see how the pursuer can claim from the railway company compensation for the coalowners doing the thing—that is, terminating the lease—which the pursuer himself expressly contracted might be done.

The loss or disadvantage to the pursuer by the cessation of traffic on the private road or way-leave would have been precisely the same if, instead of the Caledonian Railway making the new branch in question, some other railway company had crossed the district and touched the Haughhead coalfield without taking any of the pursuer's lands at all. If an independent railway had been formed, say at the other side of the coalfield, and not near the pursuer's property and if it would have given a convenient market access for the coal, the way-leave from the pursuer would have become useless, and would have been discontinued. It can hardly be maintained that in such a case the pursuer could have exacted compensation from the railway company, who had simply given a new and advantageous outlet for the mineral products of the district. I do not think it makes any difference that the branch railway now in question happens to pass through the pursuer's property and in close proximity to the locus of the private railway or way-leave on the pursuer's grounds.

With these additional observations I concur in the result at which both your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT adhered.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—Agents

No. 162.

EDINBURGH ROPERIE AND SAILCLOTH COMPANY AND JAMES HAY, Pursuers.—Kinnear—Mackintosh.

July 10, 1877.
Edinburgh
Roperie and
Sailcloth Co.
&c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

THE MAGISTRATES OF EDINBURGH, Defenders.—M'Laren—Mackay.

Superior and Vassal—37 and 38 Vict. c. 44, Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 15—Redemption of Casualties.—Held that a proprietor of part of a feu who had entered with the superior by the operation of sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, was entitled under sec. 15 of the Act to redeem the casualties in so far as applicable to his part of the feu, negativing the superior's plea that the vassal could only redeem the casualties of the entire feu as set forth in the last charter.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.

Two pieces of ground were feued by the Magistrates of Edinburgh by charters dated 1750 and 1765. The entry of singular successors was not taxed in either of the charters. These pieces of ground were acquired in 1851 by William Waddell, William Wood, George Ritchie, and others, as trustees for the Leith Roperie Company. The disposition and instrument of sasine in their favour contained an exception of nine different portions of ground which had been previously sold. No. 162.

On 21st August 1862 the magistrates, as superiors, granted a writ of confirmation in favour of William Wood and George Ritchie as surviving trustees for the Leith Roperie Company, in which it was declared that upon the death of George Ritchie the superiors should be entitled to a year's rent of the subjects as a composition, and in the event of the subjects being sold the purchaser was to be bound to take out an entry on the death of George Ritchie.

July 10, 1877.
Edinburgh
Roperie and
Sailcloth Co.
&c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

In May 1867 the Leith Roperie trustees conveyed to the Leith Police Commissioners a small part of the ground embraced in the writ of confirmation of 1862, but no part of the feu-duty payable to the city was allocated on this piece of ground. The Leith Police Commissioners were not infeft.

By disposition dated 5th and 6th May 1876 the Leith Roperie trustees conveyed the whole of the ground embraced in the writ of confirmation of 1862, with the exception of the part conveyed to the Leith Police Commissioners, to the Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Company, and James Hay as their manager, and they were taken bound to pay the whole of the feu-duty for the two portions of ground including the portion sold to the Leith Police Commissioners.

This disposition was recorded by the disponees on 15th May 1876.

The Edinburgh Roperie Company, and James Hay as their manager, brought this action against the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, concluding for decree that they were entitled under the 15th section of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874,¹ to redeem the whole casualties of superiority, and that the defenders were bound to grant a discharge of all casualties on their paying £214, 13s. 3d., being one year's rent of the subjects which belonged to the pursuers, and fifty per cent additional. The vassal, George Ritchie, who was entered by the magistrates under the writ of confirmation of 1862, was still alive at the date of the action.

The defenders maintained that they were not bound to accept a redemption and grant a discharge on payment of a year's rent and fifty per cent additional of only a part of the subjects, but that the pursuers must pay the casualties applicable to the whole of the subjects in the original feu, including the part which belonged to the Leith Police Commissioners.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) Under the original charters granted by the defenders to the authors of the pursuers in the subjects whereof the entry of singular successors was untaxed it was the right of the defenders to declare the subjects to be in non-entry on the death of the last entered vassal, and to continue to draw the rents thereof until a composition was paid or tendered, being a year's rent of the subjects disposed in feu by such charters. (2) The right of the superiors was not diminished or altered in character by their having granted charters or writs by progress to disponees of parts of such original feus ; and the successors of such disponees could not, prior to the statute of 1874, obtain an entry except upon payment of a casualty applicable to the entire original feu. (3) At all events, such successor could not obtain an entry except on payment of a year's rent of the entire subject included in the last writ by progress. (4) The provisions of the statute relating to the redemption of casualties are, in sound construction, referable to the rights and obligations of the superior and vassal at common law, and the vassal is not entitled to redeem

¹ Quoted in the Lord President's opinion, infra, p. 1035.

No. 162. merely on payment of the redemption money applicable to his part of the feu, but only on redemption of the whole casualties stipulated in the deed constituting the relation of superior and vassal.

July 10, 1877.
Edinburgh
Roperie and
Sailcloth Co.
&c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds and declares that in terms of, and in accordance with, the provisions contained in the 15th section of 'The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,' the pursuers, the Edinburgh Roperie and Sail Cloth Company, and James Hay as manager and for behoof of the said company, as proprietors of the subjects described in the summons, are entitled, upon payment to the defenders, as superiors of the said subjects, of the amount of the highest casualty estimated as at the date of redemption, with an addition thereto of fifty per cent, to redeem the whole casualties of superiority incident to the said whole lands, subjects, and others described in the summons, and payable to the defenders as superiors of the same, and that the pursuers are entitled, as at the date of signeting the said summons, being 21st November 1876, to insist upon the defenders granting and delivering to them, and are entitled to receive from the defenders, but always at the pursuers' expense, a discharge, in terms of the said statute, of all such casualties incident to the whole of the said lands, subjects, and others, and payable to the defenders from the same, subsequently to the date of signeting the said summons, and that upon making payment to the defenders of the sum of £214, 13s. 3d., being the amount of the highest casualty owing and exigible therefrom, as fixed by the defenders, including the said addition of fifty per cent, with interest thereof at the rate of four per centum per annum from the said 21st November till payment or consignment in bank of said sum of £214, 13s. 3d.: And decerns and ordains the defenders to execute and deliver to the pursuers, at the pursuers' expense, such a discharge, upon the pursuers making payment to the defenders of the said sum of £214, 13s. 3d., with interest as above set forth; but reserving always to the defenders, notwithstanding such redemption of the casualties and superiority, full right and title to levy the future feu-duties payable from the said subjects, in the same manner and to the same effect as they have heretofore been, and are at present entitled to do; and also reserving to them the right and option to insist, if so advised, that the said redemption-money, or price so to be paid by the pursuers, shall be converted into an annual sum or feu-duty equal to four per cent upon the capital: Finds the defenders liable in expenses, and remits," &c.

The defenders reclaimed.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action brought under the authority of the 15th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, for the purpose of redeeming casualties of superiority. The 15th section of the statute provides, that "the casualties incident to any feu created prior to the commencement of this Act shall be redeemable on such terms as may be agreed on between the superior and the proprietor of the feu in respect of which they are payable; and failing agreement, all such

¹ Defenders' authorities.—Wemyss v. Thomson, Jan. 19, 1836, 14 S. 233, 9 Scot. Jur. 181; Gilmour v. Balfour, Jan. 22, 1839, 1 D. 403, 11 Scot. Jur. 261; Montgomerie Bell's Lectures (1st ed.), vol. i. p. 590.

Pursuers' authorities.—Stirling v. Ewart, Feb. 14, 1842, 4 D. 684, 14 Scot. Jur. 468; Cockburn Ross v. Heriot's Hospital, June 6, 1815, F. C.; Paterson v. Murray, March 30, 1637, M. 15,055.

casualties, except those which consist of a fixed amount stipulated and agreed to be paid in money or in fungibles at fixed periods or intervals may be redeemed by the proprietor of the feu in respect of which the same are payable on the following terms, viz., in cases where casualties are exigible only on the death of the vassal, such casualties may be redeemed on payment to the superior of the amount of the highest casualty, estimated as at the date of redemption, with an addition of fifty per cent." That is the class of cases to which the present belongs, and the question between the parties is what is demandable by the superior under the words "the amount of the highest casualty estimated as at the date of redemption, with an addition of fifty per cent."

No. 162.

July 10, 1877.
Edinburgh
Roperie and
Sailcloth Co.
&c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The feus as originally given out by the town of Edinburgh consisted of a larger estate than that which is now vested in the pursuers of this action, and it may be necessary to observe somewhat in detail what is the precise history of these feus. But the ground maintained by the defenders in the present case as superiors is that the vassals, the pursuers of this action, are not entitled to redeem the casualty except upon payment of a whole year's rent of the subject,—meaning by the subject the original feu as given out by them. The pursuers, on the other hand, maintain that the casualty is to be estimated as a year's rent of the subjects held by them in feu.

The feus, portions of which belong to the pursuers, were originally given out by the magistrates in the last century—one of them by a charter dated the 31st of January 1750, and the other by a charter dated the 11th of September 1765. Now, it is averred, and not disputed, that prior to the year 1851 these feus had come to be separated into parts. Parts and portions of both these original feus had been sold off, and in that year, 1851, the whole remainder of the two feus were conveyed to William Waddell and others, as trustees for the Leith Roperie Company; and in that conveyance there were excepted nine different parts or portions of the original feus as having been already disposed to other people; so that in the year 1851 the feus had been separated into parts, and were from that date held by different vassals. We are concerned with the portion which remained vested in the Leith Roperie Company. Now, the Leith Roperie Company's trustees were entered by writ of confirmation dated the 21st of August 1862, and in that writ of confirmation it was expressly provided and declared, that if the subjects hereby confirmed shall pertain and belong to the said trustees at the death of the said George Ritchie, then and in that event we, the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council, shall be entitled to demand a composition of a year's rent or value (over and above the feu-duty for the current year) in lieu of an entry, and the same is hereby declared to be then due and payable; and in case of the said trustees selling or disposing the said subjects prior to the death of the said George Ritchie, then and in that event the purchaser or purchasers shall be bound and obliged to take out an entry from us, the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council, immediately upon the death of the said George Ritchie, whensoever that event shall happen after the date of the purchase; and the said subjects are accordingly hereby declared to be in non-entry upon the said death taking place, under which express condition and declaration these presents are granted and to be accepted of by the said trustees, and not otherwise." Now, the defenders originally pleaded in their second plea in law,—"The right of the superiors was not diminished or altered in character by their having granted charters or writs by progress to disponees of parts of such original feus; and the successors of such disponees could not, prior to the statute

No. 162.
 July 10, 1877.
 Edinburgh
 Roperie and Sailecloth Co.
 &c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

of 1874, obtain an entry except upon payment of a casualty applicable to the entire original feu." That plea was not maintained in argument, and indeed it was quite untenable, because, as applied to that very writ of confirmation to which I have just referred, it is plainly inconsistent with what is agreed between the parties as superior and vassal on the occasion of granting that writ. It is the subject which is vested in the trustees—that is, the portion of the original feus then belonging to them—with reference to which the arrangement is made that George Ritchie is to be held to be the last entered vassal. His death is to have the effect of putting these lands in non-entry, and on that occasion a composition of a year's rent of these subjects is to be payable to the superior. Now, that which is expressed in this writ of confirmation would really have been the legal effect of such a proceeding if there had been a single individual vassal, in which case there would have been no occasion for that particular agreement to which I have adverted. But it appears to me that if this plea, which is rested on the law as it stood before the statute of 1874, is bad, it follows of necessity, when we take into consideration what are the enactments of the statute of 1874, that the plea founded upon that statute is bad also. That plea, the fourth, is this,—“The provisions of the statute relating to the redemption of casualties are, in sound construction, referable to the rights and obligations of the superior and vassal at common law, and the vassal is not entitled to redeem merely on payment of the redemption-money applicable to his part of the feu, but only on redemption of the whole casualties stipulated in the deed constituting the relation of superior and vassal.” It seems to me that the 15th section of the statute, upon which this action depends, applies only to the case of an entered vassal, and if that be so it is in vain to consider whether, if a person has obtained a mere personal right by disposition to a feu or portion of a feu, he is entitled to go to the superior and say—I shall have the casualties of this portion of the feu redeemed by payment of a year's rent and fifty per cent additional. The answer of the superior to such a party would be,—I know nothing of you; you are not my vassal, and I cannot be asked to deal with you. And I think that answer would be conclusive.

But how do the facts stand as regards the pursuers? They have acquired from the trustees of the Leith Roperie Company the greater part of what that company had acquired under the two original feus, and in which they were entered by writ of confirmation in 1862, but there is a portion—apparently not a very large portion, but still a portion—of that which belonged to the Leith Roperie Company's trustees that is still vested in their persons in so far as the superior is concerned. It is said, no doubt, that the Leith Roperie Company's trustees have sold that remaining portion of the feus to the Police Commissioners of Leith, but then their right stands upon a bare disposition, and the superior has nothing to do with them, and they have no claim against the superiors. Therefore, as in a question between superior and vassal the matter stands thus,—The Edinburgh Roperie Company, represented by Mr Hay, are now the disponees of the greater part of that which belonged to the Leith Roperie Company, and formed the subject of the writ of confirmation in 1862; the remainder of it still stands in the persons of the trustees of the Leith Roperie Company.

Now, it is in these circumstances that the defenders maintain that the pursuers to entitle them to a redemption of the casualty, must pay a year's rent, not only of that which they have acquired and now possess, but of that portion also of the subject which remains in the trustees of the Leith Roperie Company. I think that contention proceeds on a total misunderstanding of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. It is conceded by the defenders that if Mr Hay had been entered by them in the same way as they entered the Leith Roperie Company's trustees in 1862 they could not have made this demand. But they seemed to forget that that which they might have been called upon to do prior to the statute of 1874 has been done for them by the statute, because the 4th section of the statute, in the second sub-section, provides that infeftment shall imply entry with the superior, and therefore when Mr Hay, on behalf of the Edinburgh Roperie Company, took infeftment in that part of the subject which he had bought from the Leith Roperie Company's trustees, he became thereby the entered vassal of the defenders. No doubt the effect of that entry was somewhat different from what would have been the effect of his taking an entry before the statute. He did not require to take an entry according to the old law when he bought this subject from the trustees of the Leith Roperie Company, because there was an entered vassal, viz., Mr Ritchie. But the statute implies the entry at once, and it provides also for what is to be the effect of that implied entry as regards the rights and obligations of superior and vassal. The third sub-section of the same section (fourth) provides that it is not to affect the rights of the superior as regards duties or casualties. In short, it provides that, as regards the casualties of superiority, they shall not be payable at any other time or on any other conditions than they would have been if this Act had not been passed. So that the effect is, that while Mr Hay was made the entered vassal as soon as he took infeftment by force of the statute, he did not require to pay a composition on that entry, his liability to pay the composition being postponed until the death of the last entered vassal, and the right of the superior to demand a casualty being in like manner postponed. The pursuers being the entered vassals of the defenders, and seeking to have the casualty redeemed under the terms of the 15th section of the statute, it appears to me quite unreasonable and beyond all intelligible construction of this statute to say that this party, who is entered with the superior and is now the superior's vassal in this particular part of the original feu as distinguished from the other, is to pay anything more by way of composition than one year's rent of that subject in which he is the vassal of the superior. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well-founded. There is no dispute as to the figures.

No. 162.
July 10, 1877.
Edinburgh
Roperie and
Sailcloth Co.
&c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

LORD DEAR, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—WILLIAM WHITE MILLAR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

ance has been executed, is not provided for at all. That is nothing more than overlooking an unlikely contingency, as testators often do, and cannot entitle us to refuse effect to the will so far as expressed. If such a contingency should occur, the truster's heirs would be the daughter's heirs, and what her right, in that event, would be is far from clear, and I do not speculate upon it.

As to the argument that the fee was to go to the daughter, whom failing, to her children, it will be observed that the words "whom failing" are not in the clause in question from beginning to end; and these are words not readily to be supplied.

But the conclusive answer to the inference attempted to be drawn from the first portion of the 8th clause is, that you cannot know the meaning of that portion of the clause till you have read the clause to the end. What the truster means in the introductory part of the clause he immediately proceeds himself to explain by saying—"And I hereby declare and direct and appoint that neither the said annual proceeds and income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with this direction."

Now, this is not a deed subject to any strict or technical construction. It is not like a special disposition of a heritable subject, the precise words of which must go into the record of sasines and be construed by technical rules. It is a mere general mortis causa deed, and the clause we are dealing with is simply intended to let his trustees understand what sort of deed (technical in so far as technicality may be necessary) they ought to execute, under professional guidance, in order to carry his intentions into effect,—just as where a testator directs his trustees to execute a strict entail without (it may be) saying more about it, the directions to execute the entail do not require to be in technical language, and are to be construed with reference to intention merely, although the entail itself must be in technical language, and will be subject, when executed, to a technical and strict construction. Now, there is not a word, from beginning to end of this clause, to the effect that the daughter is to have the beneficial fee. The only inference that she is to have a fee at all rests on the words "that neither the said annual proceeds and income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life." Now, I grant that there is here an inference that the daughter is to have a fee of some kind; but it must be a fee which shall answer the description given of it, and what that can be, except a fiduciary fee, I am unable to conceive. The framer of this deed was obviously a young and untrained conveyancer. We are all, I believe, under that impression. Probably the experienced law agents, in whose employment he was, thought their superintendence unnecessary, as the more important and technical conveyance was to follow. But the framer obviously knew that what the truster wanted was that both fee and liferent should be independent of the husband and of the husband's creditors and of the daughter's creditors; and so, in place of attempting to describe the kind of fee or the form of destination, he contented himself with a detail of the consequences the deed was intended to have, and a direction to the trustees to "make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them," so as effectually to secure these consequences. No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

I understand your Lordships now to be agreed that the daughter is to have only a qualified or limited and not an absolute fee, and the question therefore is reduced to this—What is the qualification or limitation to be? Your Lordships propose that the daughter shall be fiar, subject to the qualification that there shall be a pes successionis in the children, not defeasible by her gratuitous deeds. That is the whole qualification or limitation proposed to be put upon her right of fee in the conveyance to be executed. But the truster has declared, directed, and appointed that his estate shall not be subject to the debts or deeds of his daughter, whether gratuitous or onerous, or to the diligence of her creditors. The truster directed a conveyance that should exclude liability for the daughter's debts and onerous deeds, but your Lordships propose to direct a conveyance which will admit that liability, and even liability for her husband's debts, if they are, as in some circumstances they may be, undistinguishable from hers. That appears to me to be the very opposite of the declared will of the truster. Then we have the intensifying declaration that the estates and annual income thereof "shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life." Your Lordship in the chair has said that the only income thus referred to is the annual income before the birth of a child and the execution of a conveyance; but how the annual income, prior to the birth and conveyance, can form an alimentary and inalienable provision for the daughter during her life, if she lives after the execution of the conveyance, has not been explained.

The Lord Justice-Clerk, on the other hand, seems to acknowledge rather than to ignore the inconsistency between the latter portions of the clause and the kind of fee which he spells out of the first portion of it; but his Lordship thinks he solves all difficulty on that score by saying the concluding declarations and directions are subsidiary and auxiliary merely to what goes before, and, being of a conflicting nature, can receive no effect. But nothing that goes before is half so clear and distinct as these concluding declarations and directions themselves. They are subsidiary and auxiliary in no other sense than an interpretation clause may be said to be subsidiary and auxiliary. They are really the sting of the whole matter, and their inconsistency with the kind of conveyance now proposed to be sanctioned affords, I think, the most legitimate and convincing argument against that being the kind of conveyance the truster contemplated, especially as he concludes by directing his trustees to make full provision for carrying out these declarations and directions in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them.

For my own part, I could understand the deed being construed as contemplating a conveyance to the daughter in lifereit alimentary or allenary, and to the child nominatim and other children to be born, so as at once to vest an absolute fee in the children. But I cannot read this eighth clause of the deed and conceive it to have been the intention of the truster that there should be, in the daughter, a fee of a kind which shall render the estates liable for her debts and onerous deeds, and expose them to the diligence of her creditors.

Any question as to the nature and efficacy of the daughter's alimentary lifereit is quite a different matter from the more important question of the fee, and the one ought not to be mixed up with the other. I see no difficulty, however, in excluding the creditors, both of the husband and wife, from affecting the

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

The marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Ross also claimed the whole residue, but they did not press their claim until the question between the testamentary trustees and Mrs Ross should be disposed of.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, at the death of the truster, the deceased William Walker Gibson, his only child, Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, was a married woman, and that a child had been born of the marriage and is still in life, and that another child has since been born of said marriage: Find that in respect of the birth and existence of said children, and in accordance with the sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the said William Walker Gibson, the nominal raisers and pursuers, as trustees under said trust-disposition and settlement, are bound, after providing for the annuity of £400 per annum, payable to the truster's brother, John Gibson, to convey and dispose the residue of the trust-estate to the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, and to the child or children of her present marriage or of any subsequent marriage into which she may enter, in such terms and in such manner as will restrict the right and interest of the said Mrs Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross to the same to a liferent right allenary, and will exclude the jus mariti and right of administration of her present husband or any future husband she may marry, and liability for his or her debts or deeds, and the diligence of the creditors of such husband, and her own creditors, and will secure the same as an alimentary and inalienable provision for the said Mrs Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, and also in such manner and in such terms as will settle and secure the fee of the said residue to the pupil children already born of the said Mrs Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross' present marriage, and any other children of the said present or any subsequent marriage into which she may enter, equally among them, if she shall not otherwise appoint, but subject always to a power of division by her among her said children, and, failing a child or children of the said Ellen Percival Gibson, then to the truster's own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever: Therefore sustains the claims for the pursuers and nominal raisers, as trustees foresaid, and for David Ogg, S.S.C., curator ad litem to William Walker Gibson Ross and Reginald Carew Ross, the pupil children of the said Mrs Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, in so far as the same are consistent with the foregoing findings: Quoad ultra repels said claims: Repels the claims of the whole other claimants; and before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled in order that the parties may be heard as to the amount of the fund in medio, and as to the precise terms in which the conveyance or conveyances of the said residue are to be expressed, and reserves all questions of expenses: Grants leave to all concerned to reclaim, if so advised."

* NOTE.— . . . "The primary and principal questions, therefore, to be answered are—Who are the heirs of the residue? And to whom, and in what terms, are the trustees now bound to convey the residue of the trust-estate?"

"On the one hand, Mr and Mrs Ross maintain that as a child has been born of the existing marriage they are entitled to call upon the trustees to convey the fee of the residue of the trust-estate, both heritable and moveable, under burden of John Gibson's annuity, to Mrs Ross absolutely, with a bare destination in favour of her children nati et nascituri, and with a declaration that the provision is to be alimentary and inalienable and not liable for the debts or deeds of either Mr or Mrs Ross, or attachable by the diligence of the creditors of either. On the other hand, the infant children of Mr and Mrs Ross (whose interests in the action are protected by Mr David Ogg, S.S.C., as their curator ad litem) claim that according to the sound construction of the settlement, the truster intended to restrict, and has restricted his daughter Mrs Ross' interest in the residue to an alimentary and inalienable liferent allenary, and that he

Mr and Mrs Ross reclaimed. The First Division appointed the case to be heard before themselves and three Judges of the Second Division.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

intended to confer, and has conferred, a right of fee upon Mrs Ross' first born child, for behoof of himself and of all the other children which might be born of Mrs Ross' present or any subsequent marriage, and they desire a conveyance to be executed in favour of Mrs Ross in liferent allenary and her children in fee accordingly. They also maintain that there should be no ulterior destination of the fee to the truster's nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever. In the claim which has been lodged for the trustees they maintain the same views as to the liferent and fee which are stated on behalf of Mrs Ross' children, but they further maintain that they are bound to insert in the conveyance the ulterior destination in favour of the truster's nearest heirs and assignees.

"Having been favoured with an exceedingly able argument for all the parties, have, after the best consideration I have been able to give to the case, come to form a clear opinion in favour of the general construction of the settlement commanded for by the children of Mrs Ross, and by the trustees, and against that intended for by Mr and Mrs Ross. It is no doubt true that in the present use after the birth of a child of Mrs Ross' marriage the trustees are to cease to hold the estate for behoof of Mrs Ross, and are thereupon actually to convey the estate to her or her child or children; and it is also true that in the direction so to convey the estate the words 'liferent,' or 'liferent allenary,' or any equivalent words, are not expressly used in immediate conjunction with the name of Mrs Ross. But I think that it is impossible to read the eighth purpose of the trust-deed as a connected whole without being satisfied not only that the truster meant his daughter's interest to be limited to a bare liferent, but that the directions which he has given to his trustees as to the execution of the conveyance are sufficient to enable them to give effect to his intentions. The truster begins by directing the trustees to retain in their own hands the whole residue until his only child, Ellen Percival Gibson, who then resided with him, should be married, and until a child should be born of the marriage. Now, though both of these events actually occurred before the truster died, it is necessary, in order to understand the deed, to see what the truster intended the trustees to do with the residue in the event of his daughter not being married, or being married and not having a child born of the marriage. In the first place, he directed that until his daughter should attain majority, or be married, his trustees should either pay to her, or for her behoof, only so much of the annual proceeds or income of the estate as they should think necessary for her suitable maintenance and education. In the next place, upon his daughter being married, the trustees were to pay over to her, for her alimentary use, the whole annual proceeds or income of the residue. The truster does not appear to have expressly provided for the case of his daughter attaining majority, but being unmarried, though I think it is probable that in that case she would have been held entitled to the annual income of the estate until her marriage. And, in the third place, it is not until a child is born of the marriage that the trustees are to nude of the trust-estate. They are, however, directed to do so upon that event taking place. The duty of retention of the residue which was imposed on them by the introductory part of the eighth purpose was then to cease, and the duty of conveying and disposing the residue was to emerge. And on that event occurring the trustees are directed to convey or dispose the estate to the truster's daughter and the child or children of her marriage, or of any subsequent marriage—that is to say, to the child or children so born, and to Mrs Ross's other children nascituri.

"Now, although nothing is here expressly said as to the conveyance being to Mrs Ross in liferent, and to her children in fee, it would certainly, looking to the previous context, be natural to expect some such limitation of her right. Why did the truster so anxiously limit his daughter after her marriage, but before the birth of a child, to a bare right, to call upon the trustees for payment of the annual income of the trust-estate for her alimentary use if it was not to protect the estate of her possible children? And, if so, could anything be more

No. 163.
 July 12, 1877.
 Gibson's
 Trustees v.
 Ross, et al.

wife's liferent to the extent, at all events, of a suitable alimentary provision, and in excluding the jus mariti not only as regards the heritable estate, but likewise as regards the personal estate to be specifically conveyed, all in accordance with the will of the truster. It may not, perhaps, be practicable, without the intervention of a trust, effectually to prevent the daughter from despoiling herself of her liferent of the personal estate by her own express voluntary deeds, because there might, in that case, be no one to come forward and prevent or challenge the illegal transaction; but it is quite practicable, without a trust, to protect her liferent of that estate against the husband's jus mariti, and the acts and deeds of his and her hostile creditors. We have an instance of this as regards the exclusion of the jus mariti and of the husband's creditors, in the case of Macdonald or Young v. Loudon and Company, June 26, 1855, 17 D. 998, and the same principle would exclude the wife's creditors where her liferent is declared alimentary. The late case of White's Trustees v. White, June 1, 1877, is not inconsistent with this doctrine. The truster there, by his mortis causu settlement, conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estate to trustees for certain purposes, and inter alia, for the purpose of paying to his sister, half-yearly in advance, an annuity of £60, declaring it to be purely an alimentary provision, not arrestable for her debts or deeds, and not assignable by her, either onerously or gratuitously, in any manner of way. The jus mariti of any husband she might marry was also excluded. All the other purposes of the trust-deed being satisfied, the heir-at-law, who became entitled to the residue, called upon the trustees, with consent of the annuitant, to denude in his favour on his discharging the trust and securing the annuity to the lady over the heritable estate, which was ample in value. But it was obvious there that the truster's purpose was to secure the annuity to his sister, not only against the hostile interference of third parties, but against the voluntary deeds of the lady herself; and what the Court decided was, that it had not been shewn that this latter purpose could be absolutely secured against collusive evasion and defeat otherwise than by a trust, and, at all events, the truster had chosen that his purpose should be guarded in that way, and therefore, on considering a special case for the trustees, the heir, and the lady, we refused to sanction the proposed arrangement. That judgment does not imply that an alimentary liferent cannot be secured against the jus mariti and against hostile creditors both of the husband and wife, without a trust, so as to afford a practical protection, although a trust may be necessary, as I have said, effectually to protect the liferentrix against herself.

My opinion in the present case is, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to, and a conveyance or conveyances directed to be prepared to carry that judgment into effect.

LORD ORMDALE.—It cannot be questioned that the duty of the Court in this case is to give effect, so far as practicable, to what may be legitimately held to have been the intention of the truster. But that intention must be collected from the language he has used in his trust-deed of settlement, and not from any loose or vague speculations as to what he ought to have done.

Now, by the eighth purpose of the trust-deed of settlement, upon the terms of which the disputed question entirely depends, the deceased Mr Gibson directed his trustees to pay to his only daughter and child, Elsie Percival Gibson, now Mrs Ross, till her majority or marriage, the whole, or such part as might be required for her maintenance, education, and upbringing in a manner suited to

The true meaning of the clause was merely that Mrs Ross was not gratuitously to defeat the interests of her children. They had a protected right of succession, but the fee was in Mrs Ross.¹ A power of apportionment did not exclude the idea of a fee, although it was an indication of intention that the fiar was not to dispose by testament to the disappointment of her children.² The word "alimentary" might have been important if a liferent had been given, but it was not so as applied to a fee. It would be impossible to secure the interest of the funds without the intervention of a trust, and there was no warrant for creating a trust.³

No. 163.
July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

Mr Gibson's trustees argued ;—The plain intention of the testator was that his daughter should only have the liferent. The case was similar to that of Gerran, which was anterior to Newlands, and first established the rule as against the case of Frog's Creditors that the intention of the testator must govern.⁴ The trustees were bound to make a conveyance in ance to Mrs Ross by the use of the taxative word 'allienarly,' they would, in my opinion, be bound, while conveying the fee to her in liferent for her alimentary use, and as an inalienable provision not affectable by the debts and deeds of herself or her husband, or by the diligence of creditors, to insert, as the fiars of the property, the children born of Mrs Ross' present marriage nominatim and her future children nascituri. A conveyance in such terms would, according to a well settled rule of law, restrict the right of the parent to a bare liferent, and not the fee in the children.

"If I am right in the views above expressed it follows that the trustees are not entitled longer to retain any part of the trust-funds except so much as may be necessary to meet John Gibson's annuity, and that they are bound to convey the whole to Mrs Ross and her children for their respective rights of liferent and fee. I also think that the ulterior destination to the truster's own nearest heirs and assignees should be inserted in the conveyance. In so far as the estate consists of heritable there can be little or no difficulty in framing the conveyance and conveyances. There may be more difficulty as to those parts of the estate which are moveable; and the cause is appointed to be enrolled in order that the form and terms of the conveyances thereof may be adjusted.

"As I have come to be of opinion that the interest of Mrs Ross in the residue is not amount to a right of fee, but is a liferent to her for her own exclusive alimentary use, it follows that her marriage-contract trustees can have no claim on the fund in medio in virtue of the conveyance by Mrs Ross in their favour contained in her antenuptial marriage-contract. She has expressly excepted in that contract 'all such estate and effects as the said Ellen Percival Gibson may succeed to under any destination or provision which may settle the same on herself or her heirs exclusively.'

Farther, if the right of Mrs Ross is a bare liferent, and in no sense a right of fee, no question can arise similar to that which occurred in the case of Lady Massy, December 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 173. But I think it right, for the information of the parties, to say, that if I had regarded Mrs Ross' right to the residue as a right of fee I should have held that it was a qualified right, that her children had more than a bare spes successionis, and that they had a right of succession which the Court would have been bound to protect by some expedient similar to that adopted in the case of Lady Massy.

The case will now be enrolled for the purpose already indicated, and to enable the parties, if necessary, to ascertain the amount of the fund in medio."

Arthur and Seymour v. Lamb, June 30, 1870, 8 Macph. 928, 42 Scot. Jur.

Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 173, 45 Scot. Jur.

White v. White, June 1, 1877, supra, p. 786.

Mackintosh v. Gordon, April 17, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 105; Macdonald v. Maclean, Jan. 14, 1831, 9 S. 269, 3 Scot. Jur. 164.

Allan's Trustees v. Allan, Dec. 12, 1872, 11 Macph. 216, 45 Scot. Jur. 144.

Gerran v. Alexander, June 14, 1781, M. 4402; Dykes v. Boyd, June 3, F. C.; McGowan v. Robb, Dec. 14, 1862, 1 Macph. 141, 35 Scot. Jur.

Martin's Trustees v. Milliken, Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 326, 37 Scot. Jur.

No. 163. such terms as would carry out the intention.¹ There was no difficulty in carrying it out. It was not necessary to use the word "allenary," and a liferent allenary might be created without a trust.² A fee should be conveyed to the children nominatim. If the result could not be effectually attained as regards the income that was no reason for not securing the capital. The use of the word "alimentary" was equivalent to "allenary."³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have to determine regards the nature and extent of the interest which the claimant and reclamer, Mrs Eller Ross, is entitled to under the trust-disposition and settlement of her deceased father, William Walker Gibson, and that depends upon a construction of the clauses of that settlement, but particularly of the clause disposing of the residue. When Mr Gibson made his settlement in the year 1866 Mrs Ross was his only child, and she was then unmarried and in minority ; but at the time of his death, on the 1st of April 1875, Mrs Ross was married, and there was one child born of the marriage.

In these circumstances, the question comes to be, what is the duty of the trustees under the directions given by the testator in the eighth purpose of his settlement? He begins by directing them to retain in their own hands the whole residue of his estate "until my only child, Ellen Percival Gibson, at present residing with me, shall be married, and until a child shall be born of her marriage." He thus very distinctly assigns the term for which the trust is to subsist ; and then he proceeds to declare what the trustees are to do during this period—"Until my said daughter shall attain majority or be married my trustees shall pay to her or apply for her behoof and benefit the whole, or such part as may be required for her maintenance, education, and upbringing in a manner suited to her station, of the annual proceeds or income of my estate and effects, and upon my said daughter being married my trustees shall pay over to her for her alimentary use the whole annual proceeds or income thereof." Then he proceeds to direct and appoint what is to be done upon the further event of a child being born of the marriage. Upon that event the trust is undoubtedly to come to an end, and a conveyance is to be made. But while the trust subsists it is important to observe that there are two periods provided for by the trust—First, during the time that his daughter continues minor and unmarried she is to be maintained and brought up in a manner suited to her station, and for that purpose the trustees are to use so much as may be necessary of the annual proceeds or income of the estate. Then, after she is married and before a child is born of the marriage, they are directed to pay over to her for her alimentary use the whole of the annual proceeds or income thereof. It is only necessary to observe at present that in neither of these portions of the deed is there anything like a liferent right created in favour of the wife. Now we come to the direction as to what is to be done when a child is born, and

155 ; Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, Feb. 7, 1794, aff. April 26, 1798, 4294, Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 634, Bell's Fo. Ca. 54 ; Frog's Creditors v. Children, Nov. 25, 1735, M. 4262, Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 602.

¹ Cuming's Trustees v. Cuming, July 10, 1832, 10 S. 804 ; Seton v. Seton, March 1, 1854, 16 D. 658, 26 Scot. Jur. 364.

² Ramsay v. Beveridge, March 3, 1854, 16 D. 764, 26 Scot. Jur. 329.

³ Douglas v. Sharpe, March 9, 1811, Hume's Dec. 173 ; 1 Bell's Com. 355 ; Bell's Prin. 1956 ; West-Nisbet v. Moriston, 1627, M. 10,368 ; Tennant v. Futhie, 1637, M. 10,372 ; Dick and Dunbar v. Pinkhill, 1709, M. 10,373 ; Dawson, &c., Nov. 10, 1876, supra, p. 597.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

direction is "that upon a child being born of her marriage my trustees shall convey and dispoise to her and to the child or children of her marriage, or of any subsequent marriage into which she may enter, equally among them if she shall not otherwise appoint, but subject always to a power of division by her among the said children, and failing a child or children of my said daughter, then to my nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, the whole residue and remainder of my estate." Now, the first question is, what is the legal meaning and construction of these words taken by themselves, because these are the leading and most important words in that clause. It may be that their natural legal meaning may be overruled by other declarations in the deed, but it is very desirable, in the first place, to ascertain what is the meaning of the words of his direction to convey. Now, I think the conveyance which the trustees are hereby directed to make is, according to the true legal construction of the words used, a conveyance to his daughter of the fee of the residue. The words are—"Convey and dispoise to her and to the child or children." There is no mention either of life or of fee in this clause, and I think therefore that the true legal construction of the words is a conveyance to his daughter in fee, whom failing to the child or children of her marriage, or of any subsequent marriage, equally among them; also in fee, unless she shall otherwise appoint—that is to say, it is to be equally unless she shall otherwise appoint, but a power of appointment or division is reserved. Now, that being, according to my view, the natural meaning of these words, the question comes to be next, whether there is anything that follows a sufficient indication of an opposite intention on the part of the truster to derogate from the proper construction of the words used? My opinion is that everything that follows goes strongly to support and confirm the proper legal meaning of the words so used. He expresses himself thus—"I hereby declare and direct and appoint that neither the said annual proceeds of income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds or to the diligence of his or her creditors." Now, be it observed, there can be no mistake here of what is the subject he is speaking of, for he expresses himself in words that cannot be misunderstood. It is both the annual proceeds and income of his estates above mentioned, or, as it is expressed, "the said annual proceeds and income of my estate, and also the fee thereof;" and what is said of them is that they are not to be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband, nor subject to his or her debts or deeds, or the diligence of his or her creditors. The "said annual proceeds" plainly applies to the income of the estate, which is directed to be paid to her while the trust subsists. There is no provision of the annual income or proceeds at all except during the continuance of the trust. And therefore it is plain to me that, in so far as that part of the estate is concerned, it is declared here that no part of anything that is paid over to her during the subsistence of the trust shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration, or to the diligence either of her own or her husband's creditors. And that seemed a very reasonable provision, because the annual proceeds and income of the estate are to be paid to her after she is married, but before she has a child. But then it is also quite plain that the truster is anxious to prevent the fee of the estate from being subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of the husband, or to his or her debts or deeds; but how could the fee of the estate possibly fall under the jus mariti or be subject or liable to the husband's

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Rosa, et al.

husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with these directions." Now, this, as I read it, is a distinct declaration and direction that the daughter's interest is to be a lifereit interest. It is to be an alimentary provision during her lifetime, and the provision, such as it is, is to be inalienable; and there is also a positive declaration that the fee of the estate shall not be subject to her own or her husband's debts, but shall be free from both. But as I understand the judgment proposed by the Lord President, the fee of this estate will be subject to the debts of those parties. The daughter will be prevented from making a gratuitous disposition of the estate, but it will be subject to her onerous debts and deeds, as it was in the case of Lady Massy, which was referred to in the course of the discussion. Now, the words that appear to me most distinctly to indicate the intention of the truster are the words "alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life;" and what is that? It is nothing more or less, as I read it, than a lifereit provision to his daughter. It is not to be available for her debts; and construing the conveyance of the residue in consistency with the directions given, and with the positive declaration that her provision is to be a lifereit provision—an alimentary and inalienable provision for her during her life—I think it would be a violation of the intention of this truster to oblige the trustees to execute any conveyance which would have the effect of exposing the estate to the diligence of this lady's creditors or to her own onerous deeds.

The views of the Lord Ordinary, as indicated by him, appear to me to carry out what I think was the intention of the truster, by giving the lifereit alienably to the mother and the fee to the children. I have the less hesitation in adopting this course, because on studying the case of Lady Massy I find the opinions of several of the Judges were very materially influenced by the fact that there was nothing in the wording of the provision in favour of Lady Massy which could be held to import that anything in the shape of a mere lifereit was to be conferred upon her, while in other parts of the deed there were lifereit provisions given to others of her relatives, shewing that the man of business who prepared the deed knew how to word the settlement so as to give a lifereit. But here, instead of there being an absence of any declaration as to a lifereit, there is a most express declaration, as I read it, of an alimentary provision for the daughter during her lifetime; and this, coupled with the further declaration that it is not to be subject to her debts, leads me to think that this gentleman never intended that the fee of the estate should be settled upon his daughter.

I think, therefore, that the construction which has been adopted by the Lord Ordinary should prevail. Reference was made in the discussion to a case where instructions given to trustees to make an entail were coupled with a direction to adopt a particular entail, and yet the trustees were held to be entitled to disregard that direction—and why? because it was coupled with words which showed that the intention of the testator was that his estates should be dealt with and settled as an entailed estate, and if the direction as to the mode in which the entail should be made had been carried out that declaration of intention on the part of the testator would have been frustrated and defeated. I allude to the case of Graham v. Lord Lynedoch's Trustees, March 15, 1853, 15 D, 568, after wards affirmed in the House of Lords, 2 M'Q. 295, where the instruction was that the trustees should purchase land to be entailed in terms of a particular entail which was mentioned, but the words were added—"so as to make it a valid and effectual entail according to the law of Scotland." Now, if the direction to make the entail in terms of that particular entail had been adopted it would have been a bad entail according to the law of Scotland, and this Court held, notwithstanding the specific direction to make the deed in terms of the particular entail, that the trustees were bound to disregard that entail and make what was a good entail by the law of Scotland, so as to carry out the intention of the truster. The opinions of Lord Colonsay, Lord Fullerton, and Lord Ivory with regard to that case appear to me to be directly applicable to the question we have here to decide.

On these grounds I concur with Lord Deas in thinking that the interlocutor should in substance be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I think that the first question in this case is—What was the real wish, purpose, and intention of the testator, the late William Walker Gibson, in regard to the disposal of the free residue of his estate, heritable and moveable; what did he really mean should be done with that residue; and what was the precise measure and extent of the rights and powers in and over that residue which he truly intended should be conferred upon his daughter and her children respectively? I think this is the first question, and in putting it I purposely avoid the use of technical language, seeking only to get at the mind and will of a non-professional testator.

It is also of importance that this first question—What did Mr Gibson really wish to be done with the residue of his estate?—should be kept perfectly separate and distinct from the other questions in the case, which are—How far can the trustees or the Court give effect to Mr Gibson's intention consistently with the deeds which he has appointed to be executed? or, how far and to what extent ought the Court to give effect to the intention disregarding or superseding the special machinery which the testator contemplated employing? and still further, What ought to be the precise form and terms of the deeds of conveyance of other deeds which the trustees are now to be ordained to execute? All these questions are important, and some of them may be difficult, but none of them arise until the primary question be answered—What was the will and mind of the testator in reference to the disposal of the residue of his estate?

Now, in determining what was the will and mind of the testator—the voluntas testatoris—I am of course confined to the words of his trust-deed and settlement. I must gather his meaning and intention from the words which he has employed, reading his deed as a whole, and reading and comparing together all its parts. I must not leave out of view, also, that as the deed bears to be prepared by professional conveyancers, and as it contains technical words in many of its clauses, the canon of interpretation may apply, that where technical words are used they are to have their technical meaning, unless it appears from the context or from the deed otherwise that a different signification or a meaning more or less non-technical was intended. At the same time, I must say that in this case I feel that the rule that technical words must be read technically has very slight application, for it is impossible to read the deed without feeling that the conveyancer has not used legal and technical words with appreciation of their exact legal force and meaning, or with any accurate consistency, so as give them their

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

No. 163.
 July 12, 1877.
 Gibson's
 Trustees v.
 Ross, et al.

should be to the mother in liferent for her liferent use allenary (or, what would be equivalent, alimentary), "and to the child or children born and to be born in fee," which would have conferred a liferent on herself and a fiduciary fee for her children. This last form of destination would give the mother a title of the nature of a trust for behoof of the children, and I prefer it therefore, as, of the only two legitimate alternatives, the most in accordance with the probable will of the truster, who does not say expressly that the child who is to be born shall be named in the conveyance. If that had been said expressly there could have been no doubt at all that the mother was to be a bare liferenter. But that not being said, it is open, I think, for the trustees to accomplish the same purpose by the other and, with a view to management, the more convenient form of destination; and if a conveyance were executed in favour of the mother in liferent for her liferent use alimentary, "and the child or children born and to be born in fee," nobody will doubt that that would be a habile title to confer a fiduciary fee upon the mother and a beneficial fee on the children. That stands decided as regards heritable estate by the very authoritative case of Watherstone v. Rentons, Nov. 25, 1801 (M. 4297), where Mr Watherstone granted a disposition in favour of his daughter and her husband in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver, for their liferent use allenary, and to the children procreated or to be procreated of the marriage equally in fee. That case was reported to the Inner-House by the first Lord Meadowbank, and the Court were all clear that the point had been fixed by previous cases, and that there was there only a fiduciary fee in the parents. It has been explained that in the present case the heritable and moveable estate are together of the value of £40,000, and that about one-half of this sum may be taken roughly as the value of each. The case of Watherstone has ruled the practice ever since its date, and it is beyond all question therefore that a conveyance of the heritable estate, in the present case, to the mother for her liferent use alimentary, and the child or children born or to be born in fee, would be valid and effectual to make the mother liferentrix and the children beneficial fiars, without the necessity of any nomination of trustees.

That the same would be the consequence of a conveyance in similar terms of the moveable estate was decided in the case of Rollo v. Shaw or Ramsay, Nov. 28, 1832, 11 S. and D. 132. In that case the wife, by antenuptial marriage-contract, destined a sum of £5000, which had been bequeathed to her by her uncle, to herself and her husband for the liferent use allenary of the longest liver, and to the children of the marriage in fee. The husband uplifted upwards of £2000 of the money, and died insolvent in 1828. The widow claimed and obtained for herself and the children a ranking on his estate for the money he had so uplifted. About £3000, principal and interest, remained in the hands of his uncle's executors, and was claimed by the husband's creditors, for whose behoof Mr Rollo, W.S., expedite a confirmation as executor-creditor of the husband, whereupon the uncle's executors raised a multiplepoinding, in which a claim was lodged for the widow and children, who pleaded that "nothing was given to the husband than a liferent interest with a fiduciary fee for behoof of the children." On the other hand, a claim was lodged for the executor-creditor on the footing that the fee was in the husband. (The first) Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, (adding an instructive note), sustained the claim of Mr Ramsay and the children, and repelled the claim for the creditors. To this judgment the Court unanimously adhered, Lord Glenlee expressly observing—"This appears to me to be no difference here from the case of Watherstone." The or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with this direction." The Lord Ordinary holds that, notwithstanding the direction to convey the residue to the daughter, and notwithstanding the words, which are quite clearly expressed, that these restrictions are to be applicable to the fee which he has already conferred—that these words must be read as converting the fee which has been, in words at all events, given, into a liferent allenary. I cannot read the provision in that way. I think, on the contrary, that no such provision was intended by the testator. How far these particular restrictions can be validly and effectually carried out in conformity with a conveyance of the fee as directed in the prior part of the deed is another question, and I do not understand that our opinion upon that matter has been desired by your Lordships of the First Division. It does not in the least follow, although there may be restrictions and qualifications which the testator attempted to attach to the direct conveyance, which cannot be carried out in their integrity, that he did not intend the conveyance to be made. That is too violent a conclusion from the words, and although it is said that these qualifications are to create an alimentary and inalienable provision during his daughter's life, that to my mind means no more than this, that the fee so qualified and so restricted is only to be qualified and restricted during her life, and that the qualifications and restrictions do not apply to those who are to succeed through the after destination. I do not know that I have anything further to say. I do not see that there is here the creation of any fiduciary fee in the mother. She is given a power of division, and that rightly; because if your Lordship's intention is carried out, as I think it should be, of inserting in the conveyance what will render this a destination protected against the mother's gratuitous deeds, it is perfectly right that she should have the power also of apportioning among the children the amount of the estate. On the whole matter I agree with the opinion which your Lordship has expressed.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

LORD DEAS.—The Lord Ordinary has put a certain construction upon this deed, and directed the trustees to frame a conveyance in accordance with that construction. Assuming his Lordship's construction of the deed to be right I do not suppose any experienced conveyancer could have the slightest difficulty in framing a conveyance which would carry out that construction. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is perfectly right, although, as the case has been taken out of his hands before the draft conveyance was lodged, we do not know in what precise words he would have approved of the conveyance being expressed. The views which I entertain on that subject are not in the least inconsistent with anything in his interlocutor and note.

The conveyance was directed to be executed when a child should be born. There must have been an object in the mind of the testator in directing the execution of the conveyance to be delayed till then, and I think that must be held to have been either in order that the conveyance might be to the mother in liferent and the child nominatim and her subsequent issue in fee (which would have limited her to a bare liferent without the necessity of using any restrictive words such as "allenary" or "alimentary"), or it must have been that the conveyance

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

ance has been executed, is not provided for at all. That is nothing more than overlooking an unlikely contingency, as testators often do, and cannot entitle us to refuse effect to the will so far as expressed. If such a contingency should occur, the truster's heirs would be the daughter's heirs, and what her right, in that event, would be is far from clear, and I do not speculate upon it.

As to the argument that the fee was to go to the daughter, whom failing, to her children, it will be observed that the words "whom failing" are not in the clause in question from beginning to end; and these are words not readily to be supplied.

But the conclusive answer to the inference attempted to be drawn from the first portion of the 8th clause is, that you cannot know the meaning of that portion of the clause till you have read the clause to the end. What the truster means in the introductory part of the clause he immediately proceeds himself to explain by saying—"And I hereby declare and direct and appoint that neither the said annual proceeds and income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with this direction."

Now, this is not a deed subject to any strict or technical construction. It is not like a special disposition of a heritable subject, the precise words of which must go into the record of sasines and be construed by technical rules. It is a mere general mortis causa deed, and the clause we are dealing with is simply intended to let his trustees understand what sort of deed (technical in so far as technicality may be necessary) they ought to execute, under professional guidance, in order to carry his intentions into effect,—just as where a testator directs his trustees to execute a strict entail without (it may be) saying more about it, the directions to execute the entail do not require to be in technical language, and are to be construed with reference to intention merely, although the entail itself must be in technical language, and will be subject, when executed, to a technical and strict construction. Now, there is not a word, from beginning to end of this clause, to the effect that the daughter is to have the beneficial fee. The only inference that she is to have a fee at all rests on the words "that neither the said annual proceeds and income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life." Now, I grant that there is here an inference that the daughter is to have a fee of some kind; but it must be a fee which shall answer the description given of it, and what that can be, except a fiduciary fee, I am unable to conceive. The framer of this deed was obviously a young and untrained conveyancer. We are all, I believe, under that impression. Probably the experienced law agents, in whose employment he was, thought their superintendence unnecessary, as the more important and technical conveyance was to follow. But the framer obviously knew that what the truster wanted was that both fee and liferent should be independent of the husband and of the husband's creditors and of the daughter's creditors; and, in place of attempting to describe the kind of fee or the form of destination, he contented himself with a detail of the consequences the deed was intended to have, and a direction to the trustees to "make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them," so as effectually to secure these consequences. No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

I understand your Lordships now to be agreed that the daughter is to have only a qualified or limited and not an absolute fee, and the question therefore is reduced to this—What is the qualification or limitation to be? Your Lordships propose that the daughter shall be fiar, subject to the qualification that there shall be a pes successionis in the children, not defeasible by her gratuitous deeds. That is the whole qualification or limitation proposed to be put upon her right of fee in the conveyance to be executed. But the truster has declared, directed, and appointed that his estate shall not be subject to the debts or deeds of his daughter, whether gratuitous or onerous, or to the diligence of her creditors. The truster directed a conveyance that should exclude liability for the daughter's debts and onerous deeds, but your Lordships propose to direct a conveyance which will admit that liability, and even liability for her husband's debts, if they are, as in some circumstances they may be, undistinguishable from hers. That appears to me to be the very opposite of the declared will of the truster. Then we have the intensifying declaration that the estates and annual income thereof "shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life." Your Lordship in the chair has said that the only income thus referred to is the annual income before the birth of a child and the execution of a conveyance; but how the annual income, prior to the birth and conveyance, can form an alimentary and inalienable provision for the daughter during her life, if she lives after the execution of the conveyance, has not been explained.

The Lord Justice-Clerk, on the other hand, seems to acknowledge rather than to ignore the inconsistency between the latter portions of the clause and the kind of fee which he spells out of the first portion of it; but his Lordship thinks he solves all difficulty on that score by saying the concluding declarations and directions are subsidiary and auxiliary merely to what goes before, and, being of a conflicting nature, can receive no effect. But nothing that goes before is half so clear and distinct as these concluding declarations and directions themselves. They are subsidiary and auxiliary in no other sense than an interpretation clause may be said to be subsidiary and auxiliary. They are really the sting of the whole matter, and their inconsistency with the kind of conveyance now proposed to be sanctioned affords, I think, the most legitimate and convincing argument against that being the kind of conveyance the truster contemplated, especially as he concludes by directing his trustees to make full provision for carrying out these declarations and directions in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them.

For my own part, I could understand the deed being construed as contemplating a conveyance to the daughter in liferent alimentary or allenary, and to the child nominatim and other children to be born, so as at once to vest an absolute fee in the children. But I cannot read this eighth clause of the deed and conceive it to have been the intention of the truster that there should be, in the daughter, a fee of a kind which shall render the estates liable for her debts and onerous deeds, and expose them to the diligence of her creditors.

Any question as to the nature and efficacy of the daughter's alimentary liferent is quite a different matter from the more important question of the fee, and the one ought not to be mixed up with the other. I see no difficulty, however, in excluding the creditors, both of the husband and wife, from affecting the

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

wife's liferent to the extent, at all events, of a suitable alimentary provision, and in excluding the jus mariti not only as regards the heritable estate, but likewise as regards the personal estate to be specifically conveyed, all in accordance with the will of the truster. It may not, perhaps, be practicable, without the intervention of a trust, effectually to prevent the daughter from despoiling herself of her liferent of the personal estate by her own express voluntary deeds, because there might, in that case, be no one to come forward and prevent or challenge the illegal transaction; but it is quite practicable, without a trust, to protect her liferent of that estate against the husband's jus mariti, and the acts and deeds of his and her hostile creditors. We have an instance of this as regards the exclusion of the jus mariti and of the husband's creditors, in the case of Macdonald or Young v. Loudon and Company, June 26, 1855, 17 D. 998, and the same principle would exclude the wife's creditors where her liferent is declared alimentary. The late case of White's Trustees v. White, June 1, 1877, is not inconsistent with this doctrine. The truster there, by his mortis causus settlement, conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estate to trustees for certain purposes, and inter alia, for the purpose of paying to his sister, half-yearly in advance, an annuity of £60, declaring it to be purely an alimentary provision, not arrestable for her debts or deeds, and not assignable by her, either onerously or gratuitously, in any manner of way. The jus mariti of any husband she might marry was also excluded. All the other purposes of the trust-deed being satisfied, the heir-at-law, who became entitled to the residue, called upon the trustees, with consent of the annuitant, to denude in his favour on his discharging the trust and securing the annuity to the lady over the heritable estate, which was ample in value. But it was obvious there that the truster's purpose was to secure the annuity to his sister, not only against the hostile interference of third parties, but against the voluntary deeds of the lady herself; and what the Court decided was, that it had not been shewn that this latter purpose could be absolutely secured against collusive evasion and defeat otherwise than by a trust, and, at all events, the truster had chosen that his purpose should be guarded in that way, and therefore, on considering a special case for the trustees, the heir and the lady, we refused to sanction the proposed arrangement. That judgment does not imply that an alimentary liferent cannot be secured against the jus mariti and against hostile creditors both of the husband and wife, without a trust, so as to afford a practical protection, although a trust may be necessary, as I have said, effectually to protect the liferentrix against herself.

My opinion in the present case is, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to, and a conveyance or conveyances directed to be prepared to carry that judgment into effect.

LORD ORMDALE.—It cannot be questioned that the duty of the Court in this case is to give effect, so far as practicable, to what may be legitimately held to have been the intention of the truster. But that intention must be collected from the language he has used in his trust-deed of settlement, and not from any loose or vague speculations as to what he ought to have done.

Now, by the eighth purpose of the trust-deed of settlement, upon the terms of which the disputed question entirely depends, the deceased Mr Gibson directed his trustees to pay to his only daughter and child, Ellen Percival Gibson, now Mrs Ross, till her majority or marriage, the whole, or such part as might be required for her maintenance, education, and upbringing in a manner suited to her station, of the annual proceeds or income of his estates, and "upon my said daughter being married, my said trustees shall pay over to her for her alimentary use the whole annual proceeds or income thereof." No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

So far, there neither is, nor could well be, any dispute as to the intention of the truster, or as to the legal effect of the language he employs in expressing his intention. The dispute arises in regard to the meaning of what follows in the same eighth purpose of his trust-deed.

After expressing his intention as to the disposal, in the manner which has been stated, of the income or annual proceeds of his estate during the minority of his daughter, and while she is unmarried, the truster goes on to provide for the contingency of his daughter being married and having a child or children, in which event he directs his trustees to convey and dispoise to her and her child or children, whom failing, his own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, "the whole residue and remainder of my estate which may be then vested in them." Neither did I understand that any difficulty or dispute was raised in regard to the meaning and effect of this direction considered by itself. I am not, however, to overlook what follows; but it is important to bear in mind that according to the truster's directions as to the disposal of his estate on or after the marriage of his daughter and her having a child or children, so far as I have yet gone, it is clear and indisputable—(1) That his trustees were to divest themselves of his whole estate, capital or fee as well as the income, in favour of his daughter and her child or children; and (2) That supposing this to be done, the full fee would be in his daughter, and her child or children would have a mere spes successionis.

Accordingly, the truster goes on to declare, direct, and appoint "that neither the said annual income and proceeds of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors." Here it will be observed that the truster deals with the income of his estates, and the capital or fee, as two different things; and it must be assumed that he understood the difference between these two things. Clear it is, therefore, that, so far as I have yet gone, the truster intended that his daughter's right to the income, and to the capital or fee of his estate, should be equally full and complete, although with regard to both he excluded the jus mariti of his daughter's husband and the debts, deeds, and diligence of her creditors. How far, if at all, he could by the mere use of these words exclude the debts, deeds, and diligence of creditors is a different matter, but it is at anyrate clear, I think, that such an exclusion, so attempted to be imposed, could not change a fee, assuming one to be vested in the truster's daughter, as he expressly says it was intended by him to be, into a mere life interest. And just as little do I think it can be maintained that the fee so expressly spoken of by the truster was a mere fiduciary fee in his daughter on behalf of her children, for in that view it would have been absurd to protect it, as he does, from the jus mariti of his daughter's husband, or the debts, deeds, and diligence of her creditors. Neither her husband's jus mariti nor her creditors by any mode of diligence could possibly affect a fiduciary fee which, indeed, could be wholly valueless to them. It was a full beneficial fee, as distinguished from a fiduciary one, that it could in any view be necessary to protect by an exclusion of the husband's jus mariti, or the debts, deeds, and diligence of creditors.

But it is true that the directions of the truster in regard to the protection of

No. 163.
July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

his estates as vested in his daughter do not stop there, for he goes on to say that the same, that is, both the income and capital or fee, "shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with this direction." It is out of this part of the truster's deed that the difficulty—and I do not say that it is not one of importance—of the case arises. It is said that the object of the truster is here distinctly expressed, to the effect that his estates when they devolved to his daughter were to be an alimentary and inalienable provision for her during her life, and that his trustees were to make full provision to that effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them. This is quite true, but not more so than the truster had previously in the most unequivocal manner, as it appears to me, directed his trustees, on his daughter having a child born to her, to divest themselves by conveying to her and her children his whole estate, capital or fee, as well as income or annual proceeds. Surely this is not to be gone back upon and disregarded in order to carry into effect the subsequent declaration of the truster, that he intended his estates to remain an alimentary and inalienable provision for his daughter during her life. And to adopt such a course appears all the more inadmissible when the difficulty, or rather the impossibility without making a new settlement for him, of carrying the truster's supposed object into effect is considered. To convey his estates to Mrs Ross in life or for her alimentary use, and to her children in fee, would, according to my apprehension, be virtually making a new or different settlement for the truster than that which he has made for himself; and, after all, it would not, so far as I can see, indefeasibly secure an alimentary and inalienable provision for his daughter during her life, in regard, at least, to the moveable portion of the estates in question. Then, in regard to the creation of a trust, which was the only other mode suggested by which such an object could be carried into effect, that would be, still more obviously, making a new settlement for the truster. To create a trust in the face of the testator's express direction that the trust he had himself created should in a certain event, which has happened, be brought to an end, would not only be a violation of his settlement, and without precedent, but in the face of the judgment of the Court in the recent case of Allan's Trustees v. Allan, 11 Macph. 216.

The truster may perhaps have intended nothing more by the declaration in question than that it should appear for what it is worth in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by his trustees in favour of his daughter; but if he intended something more I do not see how his intention can be carried into effect.

In these circumstances, I have found it impossible to adopt the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary has come. The only course, I think, that can be followed is that which has been suggested by your Lordship in the chair.

LORD MURE.—I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion among your Lordships as to the rules of construction upon which this case must be decided. We are called upon to deal with a mortis causa settlement, and according to the ordinary rule, the intention of the testator as disclosed in the provisions of his settlement must be our guide in dealing with such a question as that which is here raised. The portion of this deed which we have more particularly to consider is the eighth purpose of the trust. It is of some length.

and, construing it according to the above rules, the question we have to consider is this—What has the truster here indicated to have been his intention relative to the bequest contained in this part of his settlement? Now, this intention must be gathered from the clause as a whole, and not from any isolated passage, however clear and distinct that passage may be. Because, if any particular passage is inconsistent with what appears to be the general purpose and object of the truster, or if the provisions of particular parts of a clause of this sort are inconsistent or even contradictory, they must, I apprehend, be construed and reconciled to the best of the ability of the Court when called upon to deal with them, in conformity with the general purpose and object of the truster as indicated in the whole of the clause. But where one part of a clause of this sort is inconsistent with the other another rule of construction comes into operation, which is this, that the latter part of the clause, if inconsistent with the earlier part, is generally held to prevail; and more especially is that the case if in the latter part of the clause there is a plain and distinct summing-up, as it were, of the general object the truster had in view, and a plain and distinct injunction to the trustees to carry out what he has told them to do in a manner consistent with, and so as to give effect to, his directions. If, therefore, the latter part of a clause contains a positive direction as to what the general purpose and object of the truster was, and appoints his trustees to carry that out, those instructions must, I conceive, be obeyed; and, applying this general rule to the construction of the eighth purpose of this trust-deed, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary has taken substantially a sound view of that eighth purpose.

I do not intend to trouble your Lordship by going over again the terms of this clause in detail. I have read it over frequently and carefully, and after having done so I have not been able to come to any other conclusion than this, z., that the truster never intended to give the fee of his estate to his daughter. On the contrary, he has, I think, indicated a distinct intention that her interest in the estate should be exclusively a liferent interest. In the earlier part of the clause he makes special provision of the liferent to her up to the period of the birth of her first child, and then, on the birth of the child—and this is the part of the clause which has given rise to the present question—he directs his trustees to convey and dispone to his daughter and her children the whole residue and remainder of the estate. It is unfortunate that the clause does not contain any express mention either of the liferent or of the fee. The insertion of a very few words here, such as to his “daughter in liferent only and to her children in fee,” would have tended to prevent all dispute; but those words are not there, and as it stands the clause is open to the construction that under the general word “residue” the fee of the estate may have been intended to be conveyed to the daughter. The question at issue, however, cannot, I conceive, be decided by the provision of this part of the clause alone. We cannot stop here, I say—“There is a conveyance of the fee, and we must therefore so construe the clause;” because, when we come to the latter part of the clause—which contains the instruction the party gives to his trustees, we find that the truster makes use of declarations which appear to me to be inconsistent with the existence of any fee in the daughter, or of any intention on his part that the fee should be given to the daughter. For he appoints and declares that “neither the said annual proceeds and income of the estate, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with these directions." Now, this, as I read it, is a distinct declaration and direction that the daughter's interest is to be a lifereit interest. It is to be an alimentary provision during her lifetime, and the provision, such as it is, is to be inalienable; and there is also a positive declaration that the fee of the estate shall not be subject to her own or her husband's debts, but shall be free from both. But as I understand the judgment proposed by the Lord President, the fee of this estate will be subject to the debts of those parties. The daughter will be prevented from making a gratuitous disposition of the estate, but it will be subject to her onerous debts and deeds, as it was in the case of Lady Massy, which was referred to in the course of the discussion. Now, the words that appear to me most distinctly to indicate the intention of the truster are the words "alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life;" and what is that? It is nothing more or less, as I read it, than a lifereit provision to the daughter. It is not to be available for her debts; and construing the conveyance of the residue in consistency with the directions given, and with the positive declaration that her provision is to be a lifereit provision—an alimentary and inalienable provision for her during her life—I think it would be a violation of the intention of this truster to oblige the trustees to execute any conveyance which would have the effect of exposing the estate to the diligence of this lady's creditors or to her own onerous deeds.

The views of the Lord Ordinary, as indicated by him, appear to me to carry out what I think was the intention of the truster, by giving the lifereit alienably to the mother and the fee to the children. I have the less hesitation in adopting this course, because on studying the case of Lady Massy I find the opinions of several of the Judges were very materially influenced by the fact that there was nothing in the wording of the provision in favour of Lady Massy which could be held to import that anything in the shape of a mere lifereit was to be conferred upon her, while in other parts of the deed there were lifereit provisions given to others of her relatives, shewing that the man of business who prepared the deed knew how to word the settlement so as to give a lifereit. But here, instead of there being an absence of any declaration as to a lifereit, there is a most express declaration, as I read it, of an alimentary provision to the daughter during her lifetime; and this, coupled with the further declaration that it is not to be subject to her debts, leads me to think that this gentleman never intended that the fee of the estate should be settled upon his daughter.

I think, therefore, that the construction which has been adopted by the Lord Ordinary should prevail. Reference was made in the discussion to a case where instructions given to trustees to make an entail were coupled with a direction to adopt a particular entail, and yet the trustees were held to be entitled to disregard that direction—and why? because it was coupled with words which shewed that the intention of the testator was that his estates should be dealt with as settled as an entailed estate, and if the direction as to the mode in which an entail should be made had been carried out that declaration of intention as to part of the testator would have been frustrated and defeated. I allude to the case of Graham v. Lord Lynedoch's Trustees, March 15, 1853, 15 D. 538, after wards affirmed in the House of Lords, 2 M'Q. 295, where the instruction was that the trustees should purchase land to be entailed in terms of a particular entail which was mentioned, but the words were added—"so as to make it a valid and effectual entail according to the law of Scotland." Now, if the direction to make the entail in terms of that particular entail had been adopted it would have been a bad entail according to the law of Scotland, and this Court held, notwithstanding the specific direction to make the deed in terms of the particular entail, that the trustees were bound to disregard that entail and make what was a good entail by the law of Scotland, so as to carry out the intention of the truster. The opinions of Lord Colonsay, Lord Fullerton, and Lord Ivory with regard to that case appear to me to be directly applicable to the question we have here to decide.

On these grounds I concur with Lord Deas in thinking that the interlocutor should in substance be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I think that the first question in this case is—What was the real wish, purpose, and intention of the testator, the late William Walker Gibson, in regard to the disposal of the free residue of his estate, heritable and moveable; what did he really mean should be done with that residue; and what was the precise measure and extent of the rights and powers in and over that residue which he truly intended should be conferred upon his daughter and her children respectively? I think this is the first question, and in putting it I purposely avoid the use of technical language, seeking only to get at the mind and will of a non-professional testator.

It is also of importance that this first question—What did Mr Gibson really wish to be done with the residue of his estate?—should be kept perfectly separate and distinct from the other questions in the case, which are—How far can the trustees or the Court give effect to Mr Gibson's intention consistently with the deeds which he has appointed to be executed? or, how far and to what extent ought the Court to give effect to the intention disregarding or superseding the special machinery which the testator contemplated employing? and still further, What ought to be the precise form and terms of the deeds of conveyance of other deeds which the trustees are now to be ordained to execute? All these questions are important, and some of them may be difficult, but none of them arise until the primary question be answered—What was the will and mind of the testator in reference to the disposal of the residue of his estate?

Now, in determining what was the will and mind of the testator—the voluntarius testatoris—I am of course confined to the words of his trust-deed and settlement. I must gather his meaning and intention from the words which he has employed, taking his deed as a whole, and reading and comparing together all its parts. I do not leave out of view, also, that as the deed bears to be prepared by professional conveyancers, and as it contains technical words in many of its clauses, the canon of interpretation may apply, that where technical words are used they are to have their technical meaning, unless it appears from the context or from the deed otherwise that a different signification or a meaning more or less non-technical was intended. At the same time, I must say that in this case I feel that the rule that technical words must be read technically has very slight application, for it is impossible to read the deed without feeling that the conveyancer has not used legal and technical words with appreciation of their exact legal force and meaning, or with any accurate consistency, so as give them their

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

No. 163.
 July 12, 1877.
 Gibson's
 Trustees v.
 Ross, et al.

strict legal effect. The deed in the important clauses now under construction is framed in the most loose manner, and I feel at liberty to gather from the whole clauses what Mr Gibson's real purpose was, taking the whole expressions, technical and non-technical, together, as the words of the testator himself, and fortunately, as I think, the testator, by the common and non-technical words which he has used, I think, for the very purpose of explaining his desires, has made his meaning and intention perfectly clear.

It is also to be kept in view that in construing a testamentary deed—in reading the purposes of the trust for the purpose of finding the intention of the testator—we are not bound by the rules which give certain legal effects to certain words when they are used in a deed of grant, a deed of conveyance, or even a deed of obligation. The question is not, what would be the legal effect of a deed of conveyance granted to Mrs Ross and her children in such-and-such words? On the contrary, the question is, what did the testator mean? and it is for the Court to select the words which will give full legal effect to his intention, whatever it was. In short, to use the words of the Lord President in Graham v. Lynedoch's Trustees, 15th March 1853, 15 D. 564, the case belongs “to that class of cases which have been treated as instructions to trustees, and to be ruled by the intentions of the maker—not to that class which have been treated as operative deeds of conveyance, to be ruled by the technical structure of the clauses.” Even if there were a conflict between the prescribed as indicated terms of the deed to be granted, and the declared intention of the truster, I think the latter must prevail, as it did in Lord Lynedoch's case. In that case there was an express direction to settle certain fee-simple lands under all the conditions, provisions, and “clauses prohibitory, irritant, and resolute,” contained in an existing deed of entail specially referred to, so as to make a valid entail by the law of Scotland. It turned out that the entail referred to was defective in the irritant clause, and the Court held, and that judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, that the direction to follow the terms of the bad entail must be disregarded, and that, notwithstanding such direction, a good and valid entail in different terms must be executed by the trustees. In the present case, however, I think no such conflict arises, and the directions of the testator are not inconsistent with his declared intentions.

Now, taking the trust-deed, let us see how Mr Gibson wished the residue of his estate to be disposed of. In the first place, and while the trustees themselves hold the residue in their own hands, there is and can be no difference of opinion. While Ellen Percival Gibson, the truster's only child, is in minority, the trustees are to apply the whole or such part of the annual proceeds as may be required “for her maintenance, education, and upbringing.” Next, when Ellen Percival Gibson is married, and apparently when she attains majority if that should happen first, the trustees are to pay over to her “for her alimentary use,” the whole annual proceeds or income of the residue of the trust-estate; and lastly, and it is here the difficulty begins, when a child is born of the marriage of the testator's daughter, the testator directs his trustees to convey the whole residue to his daughter, and to the child or children of her marriage, and of any subsequent marriage into which she may enter, equally among them, with a power of division to the daughter and a destination over to the testator's heirs whomsoever.

Now, if the deed had stopped here there might not probably have been much doubt as to the duty of the trustees. I think that they would have fallen to execute the conveyance in the very words or substantially in the words used by the truster, whatever the effect of such conveyance would have been. There would have been hardly room for construction or for reaching this intention of the testator and imposing restrictions or using different words from those of the testator,—the direction could be carried out in terminis, and there would have been little doubt as to the legal effect of a conveyance in such terms.

No. 163.
July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

But the case is very different when the testator goes on to declare and provide, in what appears to me to be the most express and explicit terms, what his purpose is, and what he intends and wishes to effect and to be fully secured by the terms of the conveyance or conveyances in favour of his daughter and her children, and it is in this clause, I think, that we find the testator's true intention, for the clause is introduced for the very purpose of telling what that intention is, and for nothing else. The words are—"And I hereby declare and direct and appoint that neither the said annual proceeds and income of my estates, nor the fee thereof, shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband of my said daughter, nor shall the same be subject to his or her debts or deeds or to the diligence of his or her creditors, but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them in accordance with this direction." This formal declaration of intention is not expressed in technical language, but to my mind it is perfectly clear and absolutely unambiguous. How it is to be carried out is quite another question, to which I will come immediately, but what the testator intended to be done I really have never been able, after the first consideration of the clause, to entertain any doubt.

In the first place, he meant the residue to be secured "as an inalienable provision for my daughter during her life." Does not this mean that the daughter shall have no power to sell or alienate, or squander and dissipate the residue? Does not the testator say so? What other words could he have used to make clear his will? The residue is to be secured inalienably, not for a year or two, but "during my daughter's life." Whether this can be done effectually is not the present question, but I have not the shadow of a doubt that the testator meant this to be done. Again, the provision is to be alimentary, that is to say, the daughter herself is not to be allowed to have power to anticipate it, or to touch the capital, or to dissipate the fund, but is only to get it term by term, to be available for her termly maintenance. The testator expressly says so. What other words could he have used to give utterance to his wishes? Then the husband's jus mariti and right of administration are excluded. No one will deny that this is not aptly and appropriately expressed, legal and technical words being used in their legal and correct application; but the testator in his anxiety reduplicates his words, for he declares that neither the annual proceeds nor income of his estate nor the fee thereof (for so only can I read his words) shall be subject to the debts or deeds, either of his daughter herself, or of her husband, present or future, or to the diligence of "his" or "her" creditors. This anxiety may possibly be in vain,—I shall come to that presently,—but I can hardly think that there is much room for two opinions as to what this anxious father meant. Let the residue of my estate be dedicated, he says—yes, let it be conveyed to my daughter and her children, but, oh, take care that it be conveyed and secured that her husband or husbands shall not touch it, either through jus mariti or through right of administration; that my daughter herself

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

shall not alienate it, or delapidate it, or put it away during her whole life; that her creditors shall not touch it; that her own debts and deeds shall not affect it; that the income of it shall not be anticipated and antedated, but shall always be termly forthcoming for the supply of her termly wants; that the capital shall be preserved intact—"inalienable"—during my daughter's life, and shall then be divided in the proportions that she may fix among the children or descendants that may be procreated of her body. I despair of ever estimating the force and the meaning of words if this is not the interpretation of what the testator has said—said, I mean, in the clause I am considering. Whether he contradicts himself in another clause, or says something inconsistent with his intention, under a delusive notion that he is carrying it out, may be another question. But it is a still further question how far the law will give effect to his wishes, but reading this declaratory clause as the expression of an unprofessional man's wishes, to me it is as clear as daylight what those wishes were.

I wish to remark, in the next place, that there is nothing either illegal or immoral in the testator's intentions, interpreted in the sense in which I read his will. There is nothing either illegal or improper or incompetent in a testator making his whole estate, or his whole residue, a fund for the alimentary use of his daughter, inalienable by her, and not affectable by her debts and deeds or by the diligence of her creditors, and exclusive of her husband and his creditors, the capital to be divisible at the daughter's pleasure among her issue. This is done every day, and the only questions, in my view, attending with any difficulty are, how is it to be done, and how far is it to be done in the present case?

But, before going to these questions, I must say that I am not moved in my interpretation of the trustor's will by any apparent contradictions or inconsistencies in the words he has used. No doubt he directs a conveyance or conveyances of the residue to be made to his daughter and her children. But he is not here prescribing the technical terms of the conveyance. He is merely stating who are to be the beneficiaries. A conveyance to the daughter in life for her life use alienably and alimentary and her children in fee, with a power of apportionment to the mother, would, I think, completely satisfy in every reasonable—indeed in every legal—sense the direction of the trustor, for such a conveyance would still be, in the strictest sense of the trustor's own words, a conveyance to the daughter and to the child or children of her marriage or of any subsequent marriage. They would be the dispositive in the deed. I can see here no contradiction—not even an inconsistency. And so, when it is said that neither the said income of my estates nor the fee thereof shall be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of my daughter's husband nor be subject to his or her debts or deeds, this does not in the least mean that the absolute fee is to be in the daughter. The reverse is implied. Undoubtedly the daughter is not to have the power of affecting or alienating the fee by her debts or deeds. The words may be unnecessary, but it is as if the testator had said, wherever you put the fee take care that my daughter and her husbands shall not have the power of absolute fiars; the terms of the legal deeds the lawyers will adjust.

Suppose that the instruction to grant conveyances instead of preceding followed the declaration of intention, and had been introduced with such expression as this—"And in order to carry out my intention as above expressed I direct my trustees to convey to my daughter and her children making in the conveyance or conveyances full provision, which shall be effectual for legally carrying out my intentions." In such case could it have been said that the direction to convey was inconsistent with the pre-expressed intention. But I think it does not matter which comes first—whether the testator first expresses his intention and then provides machinery which he supposes will carry it out, or whether he first provides the machinery and then declares and limits the purposes for which it shall be used. In either case the result is the same, and when the inquiry is, what did the testator mean? you are surely not to look so much to the machinery as to the express words which the testator has employed for the very purpose of declaring what his meaning was.

And so, even if there were an irreconcilable inconsistency between the expressed intention and the prescribed machinery, still if the question only is asked, what was intended? I discard unhesitatingly the unsuitable machinery, and look to the express will alone. A mistake as to the suitability of the machinery will never derogate from what the testator expressly says he meant to do. This was the principle of the decision of the House of Lords in Lord Lynedoch's case, a decision which seems to me to have a direct bearing on the present case.

This brings me to the only remaining questions in the case. Having ascertained what the testator's wishes really are, how and how far are these wishes to be carried into legal effect by the trustees under the direction of the Court?

The residue of the estate consists both of heritable and of moveable property, and I assume that the testamentary trustees are now to divest themselves thereof by conveyances in favour of Mrs Ross and her children. The truster has directed such conveyances to be granted. Whether the direction of a truster must always be carried out in terminis when the effect of so doing will necessarily defeat his carefully expressed intention, may well be doubted, and the opinions of the Judges, and indeed the decision in Lynedoch's case, rather lead to the conclusion that where a testator has clearly expressed his will and intention, and then professedly, with the object of carrying out that intention, has directed his trustees to do something which (although the testator did not know it) would really defeat the intention, the Court will vary the direction, so as to save and carry out the testator's purpose and intention. The details of the machinery must yield and be accommodated to the object in view. In the present case, however, I think there is no necessity for disregarding any detailed direction of the truster, for I think his purpose can be carried out by means of conveyances to his daughter and her children, provided such conveyances are expressed in appropriate terms.

The exact terms of the deeds to be granted are not before us, for no drafts have been prepared; but I may say, in general terms, that if these conveyances bear to be in favour of Mrs Ross in life only for her life interest alimentary use alienably, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her present or of any future husband, and to her children in fee, with a power of apportionment in her favour, and a declaration (and here I would take almost the words of the trust-deed) that neither the annual proceeds of the subjects conveyed nor the fee thereof shall be subject to the debts or deeds of Mrs Ross or her husband, present or future, or to the diligence of his or her creditors, and so on—then such conveyances will validly and sufficiently carry out the testator's inten-

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

No. 163. tions. Of course I am only indicating their terms, and not adjusting and settling the drafts.

July 12, 1877.

Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

So far as relates to heritage, I do not think there is much, if indeed there is any, difficulty. Such conveyances will not give Mrs Ross the fee of the heritage, only a liferent alimentary and exclusion of her husband, and the fee will be to the children whether they are named or not. It will make no difference in the essential right even though a fiduciary fee be held by the mother for behoof of her children. Such fiduciary fee would not expose the rights of the children to any risk, and the express declarations and provisions added would secure the interests of all parties.

But even as to the moveable estate, I am of opinion that the conveyances thereto should be in precisely the same terms and with the same declarations and provisions. This is the will of the testator, and I see no legal objection or incompetency in its being fully and literally carried out. Suppose the testator to be now living, and to desire to divest himself by conveyances, inter vivos, in favour of his daughter Mrs Ross and his grandchildren, would there be any legal objection or incompetency to his expressing himself in such inter vivos conveyances in the terms proposed? I think not; and if so, may not Mr Gibson's trustees now do what Mr Gibson, if alive, might have done himself? I think they may.

It is true that such conveyances of moveable subjects or of moveable estate will not protect the ultimate rights and interests of Mrs Ross' children, or even the rights and interests of Mrs Ross herself, so well or so effectually as could be done in the case of the conveyances of the heritage. But this cannot be helped, as the testator has chosen to direct that stranger trustees shall not be interposed for the protection of the rights and interests of those concerned. It may be that after the conveyances are granted Mrs Ross may set herself to defeat her father's intentions. She may get the moveable subjects or the cash into her own hands, and by disposing of the subjects or by spending the cash she may disappoint her children, or she may, notwithstanding the exclusion of her husband's jus mariti, hand over to him money or funds, and if they become mixed with his separate estate, or if he deals with them as owner, they may become subject to his debts or deeds. But this is just a risk against which the testator has not chosen to provide, perhaps because he had confidence in his daughter that she at least would respect his wishes, and did not need to be fettered by being put permanently under trustees.

For rights of liferent and fee, even in moveables or in money, may be constituted quite legally and quite well without the interposition of a trust and without the nomination of trustees. The interposition of a trust is not required for the constitution of such rights, but only for their security—only to afford a safeguard against their being defeated, and against the rights of the respective parties being disappointed. A sum of money or a corporeal moveable may be handed to one person for his or her liferent use alienarily, and for another party in fee; or the sum or subject may be given or handed to the fiar, subject to the liferent of another. There is nothing illegal or incompetent in such an arrangement, and no trustees are required, only without trustees there will be the risk of the solvency of the person who has the custody and control of the money. But the fact that the right of the children, or part thereof relating to moveables, may possibly be defeated by the acts of Mrs Ross and her creditors, is surely no reason why the Court itself should at once and for ever defeat the testator's intentions altogether, both as to heritage and as to moveables. No. 163.

I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr Gibson's trustees are now bound to grant conveyances of the whole residue of the estate, both heritable and moveable, in favour of Mrs Ross in liferent only, and not to her in fee at all, and in favour of her children in fee, in terms similar to those I have suggested, with all the declarations, powers, and restrictions which the testator directs; and I agree in this respect, and indeed in all respects, with the opinion expressed by Lord Deas.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

The cardinal difference, as I understand it, between the opposing views in this case is, that while Mrs Ross contends that the conveyance shall give her at once the absolute fee of the whole estate, her children contend that these dispositions or conveyances shall only give her a liferent à l'enfant, and shall give to them (the children), and to them alone, the fee of the whole. I agree with Lord Deas and Lord Mure in thinking that the contention of the children is well founded. I think that to give Mrs Ross the fee, and to the children only and merely a spes successionis (even if protected) will not be to carry out the intention of the truster, but directly to defeat it. If Mrs Ross gets a fee, she may alienate or sell the whole estate to-morrow, or at her own pleasure, while the testator says that it shall be inalienable "during my daughter's life." If she gets a fee the whole estate will be exposed to her debts and deeds, and perhaps, in certain circumstances, to the debts and deeds of her husband, while the testator expressly says it shall not be affected by such debts and deeds, and so on. I read these restrictions, which I have no doubt are the work of the testator, as pointing quite clearly to a liferent, and not to a fee, and I think the dispositions and conveyances should be limited accordingly. I am not careful to decide at present to what risks such conveyances may expose the beneficial rights of the parties; but I think that the trustees and the Court ought not to destroy rights altogether, simply because the testator has exposed them, or some of them, to risk and danger.

LORD SHAND.—I need scarcely say that the question of construction of this deed is attended with considerable difficulty. That is sufficiently attested by the fact that your Lordships are equally divided in opinion. After full consideration, however, of the terms of the deed, and having had the benefit of the argument and the views of your Lordships, I am of opinion that the effect of the deed was to give to the daughter of Mr Gibson the fee of the estate exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, with a right of protected succession in favour of her children—with this result practically, that while Mrs Ross will be vested as fiar with the right of dealing with the property as the absolute owner of it, this right will be subject to the condition that she cannot defeat or prejudice the children's right of succession by any merely gratuitous alienation, whether by deed inter vivos or mortis causa.

I concur with the observations of two of your Lordships, from whom I differ otherwise in opinion, that the Court must be guided by what they find to be the intention of the truster on the face of the deed, and also, that in ascertaining that intention you are not to take one part of this clause, and that alone, but to take the whole of the clause which has been the subject of so careful examination, and, indeed, to keep in view the whole provisions of the deed. But, adopting that principle, I think it leads to the result I have already stated.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

My Lords, I think the scheme of this settlement is not unimportant in enabling us to reach the true result. In the first place, the testator provides that until his daughter shall attain majority or marriage she is only to receive for her benefit either the whole or such part of the proceeds of the estate as might be required for her maintenance, education, and upbringing. In the next place, there is a direction that upon her marriage the trustees are to pay over to her not merely such part of the annual income of the estate as they may think necessary, but the whole income. And, in the third place, upon the birth of a child I think the truster intended to give her something more—an additional advantage—to put her in possession of his estate as her own, giving her children a right of succession to her, subject to her power of apportionment. It has been said there was no reason why the existence of a child should lead to that result, but I can very well understand how a father, looking at these three stages in the life of his daughter, may very properly and reasonably provide that the existence of a child shall lead to this result, that his estate shall then be parted with, and his daughter be put in possession of it.

Before dealing with the clause itself, I have one observation to make with reference to the view which weighs with the minority of your Lordships, and I think it is an observation of considerable weight. The result at which your Lordships have arrived is this, that it was intended by this deed to give the daughter simply a right of life-tenant, and to give the children a right of fee. If that ordinary result was what was to be effected by this deed, I can only say that it could have been attained by the employment of very familiar words—words in daily use, and the effect of which is known to every conveyancer—by merely stating that the estate was to be conveyed to the daughter for her life-tenant use only and to her children in fee. I cannot see any good answer to the view that this simple and well-known form of expression would have been used if life-tenant and fee had been intended. Taking the clause, however, as we have it, I can only read it as your Lordship in the chair has done, as giving a right of fee to the daughter. In the first place, the first portion of the clause directs the whole residue and remainder of the estate to be conveyed. It is said we have not the word “fee” there. I think the word “fee” would have been out of place in that clause. The proper way to convey an estate is to direct the estate itself to be conveyed, and the very use of the term “residue or remainder of the estate” necessarily implies a fee unless it is limited in some way. The first part of this clause directs that this estate is to be conveyed to the daughter and to the child or children of her marriage. Those words “to my daughter and to the child or children of her marriage” I think necessarily give to the daughter a fee; and the effect would be the same whether the conveyance were to her and to the child or children of the marriage generally or to children nominatim. I do not think the addition of children nominatim would make any difference, for, as I read the clause, the true import is that there is to be a disposition to the daughter, whom failing, to the child or children of the marriage, or of any subsequent marriage into which she may enter, subject to a power of apportionment. The only other way of reading the clause is to read the word “and” as copulative, in which case it would be to the mother and children of the marriage and of any future marriage, in equal shares and with equal rights, unless, as regards her children, Mrs Ross should otherwise appoint as to their shares. That is plainly out of the question, and therefore I take it that this part of the clause, concluding with the words "residue or remainder of my estate," plainly gives the daughter a fee. No. 163.

The next part of the clause contains a declaration that this fee shall not be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of her husband, nor to his or her debts or deeds, or to the diligence of his or her creditors. There, again, is the strongest corroboration of what has gone before—that the fee has been given to the daughter. The declaration is that the fee shall not be subject to the jus mariti of her husband, but unless the father had previously given the fee, and meant to give it to his daughter, he would not have thought of declaring that it was not to be subject to the jus mariti of her husband. It was argued that he may have meant something of the nature of a fiduciary fee; but I think that argument is destroyed by the other consideration which has been pressed, that the father was waiting here till children should be born, for if the children were to be the fiars there was no longer, after the birth of a child or children, the necessity for a fiduciary fee in their mother. If the truster was waiting till children were born in order that they should be the fiars, this clause, in that view, would have no meaning whatever. Accordingly as you advance in the clause both parts make it clear that a fee was given to the daughter. I quite feel that the words which follow present a difficulty, and a difficulty which has led to the difference of opinion here, and I do not disguise that a serious question is raised by the declaration that "the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life." But in regard to these words, in the first place, let me say this, that in the absence of the trust which the truster directed to be brought to an end, even the liferent right would not be protected against Mrs Ross' own deeds or the diligence of creditors. That seems to me to follow from the recent decision in White's Trustees (supra, p. 786). It is said that the intention of the testator is to be carried out, that it is plain he meant this should be an alimentary and inalienable provision, and that effect must be given to his intention. That cannot be after the trust comes to an end, even as regards the liferent right. But further, what about the moveable estate we are here dealing with? The trustees have given us a statement of the funds, and apparently there seems to be about £15,000 in cash to be handed over, and which the trustees are entitled to hand over, to this lady. It is said this estate is declared to be an alimentary and inalienable provision for the daughter during her life, but how is it proposed that the £15,000 shall be so treated, consistently with handing it over to her? It is said you shall give effect to the intention of the truster, and that whatever machinery is required to do that must be imposed. The only machinery that could by possibility do that would be the creation of a trust. You cannot give this lady £15,000 and at the same time make it an alimentary and inalienable provision for her, because the moment she gets the money she is entitled to dispose of it, and I do not understand any of your Lordships to have suggested a course that would prevent that. And so, next, advancing to the heritage, I think we are very much relieved of any difficulty that might arise in regard to it, and at the same time find a ready answer to the argument referring to this part of the estate, by the fact that really a great portion of this estate cannot be put into the position in which it is said the truster intended it to be. I rather think it appears from the deed that the truster did intend that in some way his estate should be alimentary and inalienable; but, upon the other hand, I find it as clear as words can make it that he intended at the same time, first, that the trust should come to an end; and, secondly, that

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

while there should no longer be a trust, there should be a fee conveyed to his daughter. If those two things are to be done, if you are no longer to have a trust, and if you are to have a fee conveyed, and if it be inconsistent with that to create an alimentary and inalienable provision, why should the fee be taken away and the trust continued to carry out the latter part of the deed? The truster seems to have had some crude notion that though the fee was to be thus conveyed it could in some way be protected like an entailed estate. In that he was wrong. But it would be going against the intention of the truster to say that while he said there was to be a fee, and that the trust was to come to an end, you are, in order to make this provision inalienable, to take away the fee, and, if necessary, introduce a trust in order to work out the other part of his intention. I think that would be injustice to this lady, who has a right to the fee; and I think the Court is not entitled, in order to work out the subsequent part of the clause, to go back upon that which the truster has quite distinctly said. I have only further to mention an additional reason that leads me to the conclusion at which I have arrived, viz., that a deed which would give this lady the estate in life for her life for use alienably, and to her children in fee, whom failing to her father's heirs and assignees whomsoever, would have this extraordinary effect, that supposing the children who are now alive should die and that she had no other children, this estate would go entirely beyond her control—that is to say, the truster's only child would have no power of disposing of or dealing with it in any way whatever, and it would go to heirs and assignees of her father unknown. I think that circumstance strongly confirms the general view that what this gentlemen meant was that after his daughter's marriage and the birth of a child this estate should be given to her, to be her own, but with a right of succession in favour of her children, which she could only defeat by onerous deed—and I may say I think this right of succession is to be directly inferred from the power of apportionment which is given.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that at the death of the truster, the said William Walker Gibson, his only child, Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, was a married woman, and that a child had been born of the marriage and is still in life, and that another child has since been born of said marriage: Find that in respect of the birth and existence of a child of the marriage, and in accordance with the sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the said William Walker Gibson, the nominal raisers and pursuers as trustees under said trust-disposition and settlement are bound, after providing for the annuity of £400 per annum payable to the truster's brother, John Gibson, to convey and dispose the residue of the trust-estate to the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross in fee, but exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her present or any future husband, whom failing to the children already born or to be born of her present or any future marriage, equally among them, also in fee, subject to the condition that the right of succession of the said children to the said residue, or to a sum of money equal to the value of the said residue, on the death of their mother, shall not be defeated or prejudiced by any gratuitous act or deed done or executed by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, but with power to the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross to divide the said residue or equivalent in money among her said children in such proportions as she may think fit, and failing children of the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross then to the nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever of the said deceased William Walker Gibson, the truster: To this extent and effect sustain the claim of Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross and her husband, and repel the claims of the pursuers and nominal raisers, and of the curator ad litem for the pupil children of the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross, and decern: Reserve for future consideration the claim of the marriage-contract trustees of the said Ellen Percival Gibson or Ross and her husband: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause as shall be just, and consistent with the above findings: Reserve all question of expenses," &c.

No. 163.

July 12, 1877.
Gibson's
Trustees v.
Ross, et al.

J. & R. D. Ross, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—GRAHAME BINNY, W.S.—
MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

ALFRED DONALD MACKINTOSH, Pursuer.—Kinnear—Murray.
BARON ABINGER AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Balfour—Keir.

No. 164.

July 12, 1877.
Mackintosh v.
Abinger, et al.

Teinds—Heritable Right—Prescription—Possession.—A proprietor of lands who had no title to the teinds conveyed in 1766 several parcels of land to trustees for family purposes, "with the several manor-places, milns, teinds, &c. belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed, and contained in the particular charters and infestments thereof." The trustees, as directed by the truster, executed a conveyance in 1772 to a beneficiary in the same terms. The subsequent titles contained no mention of teinds. The proprietors did not pay teind to any titular, but they submitted to localities in 1837 and 1862, made on the footing that they had no heritable right to the teinds. In an action raised by the heritor in 1875, for reduction of the decrees of locality, and declarator of his heritable right to the teinds, held (1) that it was competent to ascertain by examination of the previous titles, though beyond the prescriptive period, whether the truster had a right to his teinds in 1766; (2) that as he had no such right, the trust-deed conveyed none.

Observations on the possession necessary to establish a heritable right to teinds.

THIS was an action by Mr Mackintosh of Mackintosh, concluding for reduction of two decrees of locality of the parish of Kilmonivaig, dated in 1837 and 1862, and for declarator that the pursuer had a heritable right to the teinds of his lands of Brae Lochaber, commonly called Glenroy and Glenspean, in that parish, and that new allocations should be made as for 1834 and 1861 downwards. The Lord Advocate, the minister of the parish, the presbytery, and the other heritors of the parish, were called as defenders.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Teind Clerk.

Defences were lodged by Lord Abinger and Mr Ellice, two of the heritors.

The pursuer averred that he had a heritable right to his teinds in virtue of his titles, and that by the decrees sought to be reduced his lands had been erroneously localled upon as if he had no heritable right. The defenders maintained that the pursuer's titles did not instruct a heritable right, and that as he had not alleged such a right in any of the localities of the parish he was not in any view entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions.

The first title founded on by the pursuer was a trust-disposition and settlement by Æneas Mackintosh of Mackintosh in 1766, conveying lands in several parishes, and lastly, "the lands of Brae Lochaber, commonly called Glenroy and Glenspean, lying within the parish of Kilmanivach and sheriffdom foresaid, with the severall manner places, milns, teinds, fishings, woods, sheallings, grazeings, priviledges, parts, pendicles, and

No. 164. haill pertinents belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed and contained in the particular charters and infeftments thereof.”
 July 12, 1877. The trust was for family purposes, including payment of debts and Mackintosh v. various annuities and provisions, and thereafter to convey the residue of Abinger, et al. the lands to the truster's nephew on his attaining majority, and a series of substitutes. The precept directed infeftment to be given by delivery of “an handful of grass and corn for the tythes.”

The trustees were infeft, and in 1772 conveyed all the lands in precisely the same terms to the truster's nephew, Æneas Mackintosh, afterwards Sir Æneas, who was infeft in 1776.

In August 1819 Sir Æneas executed an entail of his estates, consisting of several parcels of land in different parishes. The lands in question were thus described :—“As also All and Whole the towns and lands of Glenspean and Glenroy in Lochaber, viz. the lands of Bohunton, Kinkellie,” &c. “with the woods, fishings, houses, biggings, tofts, crofts, parts, pendicles, outsets, gleus, shealings, grazings, and universal pertinents thereof, lying within the lordship of Lochaber and shire aforesaid.” The only parcel conveyed with the teinds was certain lands in the parish of Laggan.

In September 1819 Sir Æneas was served heir in special to his uncle in the lands in question, and was infeft upon a precept from Chancery following upon the retour. In these deeds there was no mention of teinds.

In 1820 Alexander Mackintosh was served heir of tailzie and provision to Sir Æneas, and also heir-male in general, and he expedie in the same year a crown-charter of resignation and confirmation in favour of himself and the other heirs of tailzie, proceeding on the procuratories in the entail and in the trust-disposition of 1766, and confirming the trust-disposition, on which he was infeft, and also in 1822 granted a charter of resignation and confirmation in favour of himself and the other heirs of tailzie upon which he was infeft. In these deeds, and all the subsequent entail titles, the lands were described as in the entail, without any mention of teinds.

From the titles prior to 1766 it appeared that the proprietor was not infeft in the teinds of the lands in question at that time.

It appeared from the extract decree of locality of 1837 that the amount of free teind in the parish was £447 from the lands of four heritors, of which the sum effeiring to the lands of Mackintosh of Mackintosh was £374. The common agent reported—“This sum, therefore, of £447, 15s. 5½d. falls to be allocated upon the respective heritors of the parish pari passu, in the proportion of their different valuations for the augmented stipend due to the minister, none of the heritors having, or pretending to have, any right to their teinds (as far as has come to the knowledge of the common agent), except the Duke of Gordon and Alex. M'Donall, Esq. of Glengarry, who, as already stated, insist not on any privilege arising to them therefrom at present.”

It appeared from the same decree that there were several competing claimants for the titularity, none of whom had made good their claims, and none of the heritors paid any teind to the titular. In the locality Mr Mackintosh had to pay a large portion of the augmentation which he would not have had to pay if he had instructed a heritable right. The same thing happened again in 1862; but on that occasion all the other heritors except Mr Mackintosh and one other produced and established heritable rights to their teinds.

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

* “NOTE.—The pursuer maintains that he has a heritable right to the teinds

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—Long possession of teinds, with very little evidence of original right, was sufficient to exclude the titular.¹ No. 164.
All inquiry into prior titles was excluded.²

July 12, 1877.

Mackintosh v.

Abinger, et al.

The defenders argued ;—It was competent to look at titles beyond the prescriptive period for the purpose of ascertaining the true meaning of a conveyance.³ On a sound construction of the trust-deed the teinds were never conveyed by it. Besides, there had been no possession distinctive of the right.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer asserts a heritable right to the teinds of his in question in virtue of a title commencing in 1770, followed by possession. Apart from this prescriptive title he does not pretend any right.

“The original title on which the pursuer founds is a mortis causa trust-disposition, dated 2d December 1766, whereby Aeneas Mackintosh conveyed to trustees a variety of lands, including the lands of Brae Lochaber, ‘with the several manor places, milns, teinds, &c. belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed, and contained in the particular charters and infeftments thereof.’ On this deed the trustees were infeft in 1770. The instrument of sasine contains no limitation such as exists in the disposition by reference to the previous charters and infeftments.

“In 1772 the trustees, in execution of their trust, conveyed the lands to Aeneas Mackintosh and a series of heirs. The description of the subjects so conveyed is the same as in the trust-deed, and the infeftment following on the disposition is the same as the infeftment of the trustees.

“The deeds which have been just mentioned did not contain any special description of the lands conveyed ; but the subsequent titles do so. The lands of Brae Lochaber are conveyed without the teinds, and no title subsequent to the trust-deed and the disposition by the trustees contains them.

“The defenders object to the dispositions of 1766 and 1772, that they are mere general conveyances referring to the previous charters and infeftments for the subjects which are actually conveyed, and they plead that they are explained by the subsequent titles, which contain a particular description and convey the lands of Brae Lochaber without the teinds. They farther produce the infeftment of the granter of the trust-deed, which shews that he was not infeft in the teinds of Brae Lochaber.

“The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders are right. The dispositive clause contains the measure of the subjects conveyed. Whether the teinds of Brae Lochaber were included or not depended on the previous charters and infeftments, and these shewed that the granter of the trust-deed was not the proprietor of them. The titles following on the disposition by the trustees shew that neither they nor the truster intended to convey the teinds of Brae Lochaber.

“Besides, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the pursuer and his predecessors have not possessed the teinds under the titles on which they found. In the several localities they have been localled on as not possessing the teinds on a heritable right. It appears that there has been a dispute as to the titularity, and the pursuer alleges that he and his predecessors have never paid the surplus teinds to any one. But when they have been localled on on the footing that they have no heritable right, it seems to the Lord Ordinary to be impossible to hold that they have been possessing their teinds as the owners thereof.”

¹ Solicitor of Teinds v. Budge, May 4, 1797, Hume’s Dec. 455 ; Watt’s Trustees v. King, Nov. 10, 1869, 8 Macph. 132 ; Campbell v. Earl of Moray, 1770, M. Teinds, App. 4 ; Scott v. Muirhead, 1672, M. 15,638 ; Dunning v. Creditors of Tillibole, 1748, M. 15,659 ; Mansfield v. Robertson, May 26, 1835, 13 S. 832, 7 Scot. Jur. 382.

² Duke of Buccleuch v. Cunynghame, Nov. 30, 1826, 3 Ross, L. C., L. R. 338.

³ Earl of Dalhousie v. M’Inroy, July 20, 1865, 3 Macph. 1168.

No. 164. lands of Brae Lochaber, otherwise called Glenroy and Glenspean, in the parish of Kilmonivaig. On that ground he seeks to set aside the last two final decrees of July 12, 1877. of locality of the parish, because the lands have there been localled upon on the Mackintosh v. Abinger, et al. footing that there was no such right, and he also concludes for declarator that he has such a heritable right, and that all allocations of stipend must hereafter be made upon that footing.

Now, the title by which the pursuer says the right was conveyed dates from the last century. The first instrument is a disposition in 1766, upon which infestment followed, and there is another disposition in 1772 upon which also infestment followed. The first disposition is granted by Æneas Mackintosh, then proprietor of the lands, to trustees, and the obvious intention of the deed is to convey the truster's whole landed estate, consisting of various parcels, for family purposes. The disposition in that view may be called a general disposition of heritable estate, because, though the parcels of land are named they are not described at length as in the other titles. After describing all the parcels this clause follows,—“With the several manner places, milns, teinds, fishing woods, sheallings, grazeings, priviledges, parts, pendicles, and haill pertinenz belonging to and on the respective lands above dispoined and contained in the particular charters and infestments thereof.” It is obvious that this clause was intended to cover everything that there might be in any of the previous titles, and so vest it in the disponees. But the contention that it was intended to convey anything except what was in the previous titles cannot well be maintained.

The trustees, after being in possession for a few years, conveyed the same subjects to Æneas Mackintosh, the nephew of the truster, and their conveyance is exactly in the same terms, and the infestment which followed is also substantially in the same terms.

Now, the pursuer maintains that these instruments give him a good title to the teinds of these lands, and he has cited several cases which are very familiar to us, in which teinds have been held to have been impliedly conveyed. But I am not sure that these cases are in any way applicable, because in all of them the question was whether the disponent being the undoubted proprietor of the teinds had conveyed them along with the lands. But here it cannot be assumed that the party who granted the deed was the owner. If it had been shown that he was so, there could be very little doubt that this conveyance would be sufficient to convey the teinds. But it cannot be assumed from the deed that Æneas Mackintosh, the truster, was owner of the teinds, especially looking to the fact that it is a conveyance intra familiam for family purposes. It may remain a question of doubt whether he intended to convey any teinds whatever, and particularly those appertaining to the one parcel with which we are dealing.

It appears to me that in order to solve that question it is competent to look both at the previous and the subsequent titles. No doubt if we were considering what constituted the feudal progress upon which the pursuer founds, we should not be entitled to go beyond this deed, and if it were clear on the face of the deed that it was intended to be a conveyance of the teinds of this parcel of land I do not think we could go further. But on that matter the deed is, to the contrary, quite ambiguous, and we are all the more entitled to refer to the previous titles where the truster has himself expressed his intention to convey what was contained in the previous charters and infestments, and nothing else.

When we go back to the previous titles we find it as clear as possible that the granter had no right to the teinds. No. 164.

Again, when we look at the subsequent titles we find no conveyance of teinds in any title applicable to these particular lands. The disponee from the trustees who acquired his right in 1772 possessed on that title down to 1819, so that if he had a good title to prescribe there was abundance of time. But when that gentleman comes to deal with the estate and make up his title he serves himself heir to the truster, and so takes up the estate as it stood in him. He then obtains a precept from Chancery to infeft him under that retour, and the proper officers took the last crown-charter which was in favour of the truster for their guidance, and by their precept enabled Sir Æneas, the disponee from the trustees, to put himself in the position in which the truster stood in 1766; and what was that position?—the proprietor of Glenroy and Glenspean without the teinds. Thus, the first step which Sir Æneas took in making up his title with the Crown was to put himself in the position of proprietor without the teinds.

July 12, 1877.

Mackintosh v. Abinger, et al.

In anticipation he had made an entail. Clothed with the crown-right he grants procuratory resigning the lands for new infeftment in favour of a series of heirs whom he subjects to the fetters of an entail, and in that procuratory no teinds of Glenroy and Glenspean are mentioned. Indeed, they could not be, because the entailer had made himself a crown-vassal in the lands without the teinds.

No doubt he had also acquired the right which was conveyed by the trust-disposition, and the next heir, Alexander Mackintosh, gets that right confirmed, and if the effect of that had been to give the teinds, the heirs of entail might have been entitled to take infeftment in the teinds as well as the lands, but they did not do so, and up to this time no one has attempted to do so.

The right therefore depends entirely on the clause in the disposition of old Æneas Mackintosh to trustees for family purposes. It is clear that clause only found a place there from his anxiety to embrace everything. But it is limited—and that is most important—by a reference to the previous titles. These shew that there was no right to the teinds in the person of the granter, while the subsequent titles shew that none of his successors imagined that they had or could convey to others any such title.

If we take into consideration as a third element the state of the possession,—here speak, not of the forty years' possession requisite to fortify a title, but of the possession as interpreting the title,—we find the possession to have been consistent with all the other titles, and inconsistent with the disposition to the trustees as now sought to be interpreted, because during the whole time the owner was localled on in the parish on the footing that he had no heritable right to his teinds.

Taking these three things together, I can arrive, with perfect satisfaction, at the conclusion that it was not intended by the disposition of 1766 or the infeftment which followed in 1772 to convey the teinds of Brae Lochaber. That is sufficient for the decision of the case. But I think it right to say that if the title had been good I should have had great difficulty about the possession. No doubt the proprietor was not called on to pay teinds to the titular. But he has been called on to pay a large proportion of them to the minister. The teinds in his hands were subject to the burden of stipend. But if they belonged to him they were subject to the burden to a much less extent. But he paid the

No. 164. full sum demanded on the footing that they did not belong to him. That was a most serious invasion by the party making the locality, and all concerned, on July 12, 1877. this gentleman's possession; for if he possessed the teinds in virtue of the Mackintosh v. Abinger, et al. deed of 1766, as conferring a good heritable right, he could have kept to himself a much larger share of them.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary on both grounds.

LORD DEAS.—The question in this case is whether the pursuer has instructed a heritable right to the teinds of his lands of Brae Lochaber, commonly called Glenroy and Glenspean.

The title founded on by the pursuer is a mortis causa trust-disposition and settlement executed by his predecessor, Æneas Mackintosh, on 2d December 1766, and instrument of sasine thereon, dated 19th and other dates in October 1770, and recorded in the Register of Sasines on 20th November 1770.

By that trust-disposition the granter (who left no family), on the narrative of love and favour for his friends and relatives therein named, "and for preventing all debates and differences about the succession to or management of my means and estate," conveyed a variety of lands belonging to him, and, inter alia, the lands of Brae Lochaber, commonly called Glenroy and Glenspean, in the parish of Kilmanivach and sheriffdom of Inverness, to Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck, Esq., one of the Senators of the College of Justice, and, failing him, to certain other persons named in succession, and their assignees, "as trustees, to the ends, uses, and purposes" thereafter set down, viz. for payment of the truster's debts, an annuity to his widow, and annuities and pensions to various other persons named in the deed, with power to borrow or sell so far as might be necessary, and a direction to convey the remainder and residue of the lands and estate thereby disposed to the truster's nephew, Æneas Mackintosh, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the truster's nearest heir-male whatever. In short, the deed was a mere mortis causa settlement for family purposes, and, as might be expected in such a deed, a clause was added bearing that the lands were conveyed "with the severall manner places, milns, teinds, fishings, woods, sheallings, grazings, priviledges, parts, pendicles, and hail pertinents belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed, and contained in the particular charters and infeftments thereof." The object obviously was, by the use of general terms, to avoid the risk of omitting anything which might be contained or comprehended in the previous charters and infeftments in favour of the truster and his authors, and so to make sure that whatever he had a right to convey should be carried to his trustees for behoof of the beneficiaries under the deed.

The deed contained procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine in terms corresponding to the dispositive clause, the precept authorising infeftment to be given by delivery "of earth and stone of the ground of the said respective lands, the clapps and happers of the milns, an handful of grass and corn for the tythes, and of all other symbols usual and necessary in the like cases." The infeftment expedite upon the precept was, of course, in these terms accordingly.

Now, it is obvious to remark that the deed on which this infeftment followed does not enable us ex facie to know what teinds, if any, were thereby conveyed. The deed refers for that information to the previous charters and infeftments, and when we examine these previous charters and infeftments,—commencing with the charter by James the Sixth in favour of William Mackintosh of 6th

February 1621,—we find in them, indeed, the lands of Glenroy and Glenspean, No. 164. but we find no mention or conveyance whatever of the teinds of these lands. It is true the previous charters and infeftments might have been lost, and, if they had been so, a question would then have arisen, what was the presumption on the face of the trust-disposition of 1766 and infeftment thereon? But they are not lost, and that question, therefore, does not arise. July 12, 1877.
Mackintosh v. Abinger, et al.

I do not think it necessary, however, to affirm that if there had been possession of the teinds in question for the period of the long prescription in the unequivocal character of owner, such a title as that constituted by the deed of 1766, and infeftment thereon, might not have been sufficient. But it is essential to keep in view, that from the date of the deed of 1766 down to the present time, embracing the whole of the prescriptive period, the pursuer and his predecessors have been paying a heavy burden of stipend to the minister out of these teinds, viz. £55 or thereby, prior to 1837, and £232 or thereby since that date, for which sums they were not liable if they had had a heritable right to the teinds. Coupling this with the fact that there was no titular in the field claiming the surplus teinds, and no known titular to whom, supposing teinds to be exigible, they could have been paid, I do not think the possession, which has thus consisted solely in the surplus teind being left undrawn, can be held to have been possession of the teinds in the character of owner, of the unequivocal kind necessary to exclude all reference to the previous charters and infeftments, and to require us to construe and give effect to the deed of 1766 as if it had been an ex facie absolute conveyance of the teinds in dispute.

I think what I have said is enough, without going into the terms of the entail title, to warrant an adherence to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURK.—The case is shortly put in the Lord Ordinary's note, and I am satisfied he has taken the sound view.

The existing title to the estate, which is the entail title, does not contain any conveyance of these teinds, either general or special, while it does contain a conveyance of the teinds of other lands, namely, those in the parish of Laggan.

But it is said we are to go back to the dispositions of 1766 and 1772, which carry teinds. These deeds, however, are open to the observation that they do not convey, even in general terms, the teinds of these lands per expressum, but only the teinds "contained in the particular charters and infeftments thereof." The conveyance being so qualified, it is necessary to go back to the previous charters, and when that is done, it is clear that they contain no right to the teinds of the lands in question, so that the granter does not appear to have had the teinds to convey.

Then as to the possession. It has never been asserted by the proprietor that he had a heritable right; and though there has been no payment of teinds to the titular, they have been localled on, and that has always been distinctly upon the footing that there was no heritable right.

LORD SEAND concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against: Sustain the defences stated for Lord Abinger and Edward Ellice: Assoilzie them from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the said defenders entitled to expenses," &c.: "Quoad ultra dismiss the action, and decern."

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 165.

SCOTTISH EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, Pursuers.—

*Balfour—Pearson.*July 13, 1877. ROBERT BUIST AND OTHERS, Defenders.—*Fraser—Scott—J. P. B. Robertson.*Scottish Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.*

Insurance — Reduction — Fraudulent Misrepresentation.—Circumstances in which a policy of life assurance in the hands of onerous assignees was reduced on the ground of false statements made by the assured in applying for the policy, with reference (1) to his habits of life, (2) his health, and (3) his transactions with other companies.

Observations (per Lord President) on the duty of an insurance company towards assignees or others interested in the event of their ascertaining during the currency of the policy that it is open to challenge.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.Vide 14th July 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 1078.

This was an action raised at the instance of the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society for reduction of a policy of insurance granted by them on the life of the late George Moir, cattle-dealer, Edinburgh, on 22d June 1872, against Robert Buist and others as Moir's assignees.

Several points of law were raised by the defenders which were disposed of by the Court on 14th July 1876 by an interlocutor which repelled the 1st, 3d, 5th, 7th, and 11th pleas for the defenders, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary of new to allow the parties a proof of their averments.

The ground on which the pursuers sought reduction of the policy was that the statements made by Moir in his answers to the printed questions contained in the form of proposal submitted by him to the society were false in material points.

Appended to the form of proposal was the following declaration, which was signed by Moir:—"I, the above designed George Moir, do hereby declare that the above particulars are correct and true throughout, and that I have not concealed or withheld any circumstance tending to render an assurance on my life more than usually hazardous; and I do hereby agree that the foregoing proposal, together with what is therein contained, and this declaration, shall be the basis of the contract between me and the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society, and that if any untrue averment is contained in this declaration, or in the answers above given, or if it shall hereafter appear that any of the matters above set forth have not been truly and fairly stated, then all monies which shall have been paid on account of the assurance to be made in consequence hereof shall be forfeited and belong to the society; and all claim to any benefit out of or interest in the funds of the said society, in virtue of any certificate or policy that may be issued or delivered in relation hereto, shall be barred and excluded, and the policy itself shall be absolutely null and void. And I hereby declare my accession to the articles of agreement and constitution of the society, and to all the alterations thereof, and to the by-laws and regulations of the society. Signed at Edinburgh this 12th day of May 1872 years. (Signed) GEORGE MOIR"

The particular questions founded on and the corresponding answers were,—“5. Are your habits sober and temperate? Yes. Have they always been so? Yes. 9. Have you ever been affected with insanity.

* Two other actions, The Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society v. Robert Buist and Others, and The General Life and Fire Assurance Company v. Walter Kidd, arising out of similar transactions in the same circumstances, were disposed of of the same date, but there were no specialities to distinguish them from the case reported, in which a proof applicable to all three cases was led.

apoplexy, palsy, dropsy, asthma, liver complaint, rupture, consumption, No. 165. or spitting of blood, epileptic or other fits, or any disorder tending to impair the constitution or shorten life? No. 15. Has your life ever been proposed for assurance? if so, name the office, and state the date and result? No."

July 13, 1877.
Scottish
Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The statements and answers made by Mr Moir as aforesaid having been untrue, the said policy and the assurance bearing to be thereby effected are void, in terms of the stipulation to that effect, and the same ought to be reduced, with all that has followed thereon. (2) At all events, Mr Moir having, in making the said statements and answers, made misrepresentations and concealed facts and circumstances material to the said contract of assurance, and, separatim, having done so fraudulently, and having thereby induced the pursuers to enter into the same, the said policy, and all that has followed thereon, is reducible, and ought to be reduced.

The defenders denied that the answers to these questions were false, or at least that Moir made them knowing them to be false, and with a fraudulent intention.

They also averred as the ground of a special defence—"That any of the facts alleged by the pursuers in their condescendence which are material, if true, were known to the pursuers before accepting payment of premiums from the defenders, and these premiums were taken payment of from the defenders without any intimation that liability would be repudiated in the event of Moir's death. At least they continued to take payment of premiums from the defenders after they knew of said facts, or after they had ample means of ascertaining them, and had been put upon their inquiry. The pursuers hold out their policies to the public as negotiable documents and good investments either for purchasing or lending money on."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The pursuers, after ascertaining the facts, or at least having the means of ascertaining them, and being out on their inquiry, having admitted the claim made by the defenders, cannot now dispute the same. (7) Any fact material to the issue having been known to the pursuers before accepting payment of the premiums or some of them, from the defenders, or at least having continued to take premiums after knowing said facts, they are now barred from objecting to the claim.

Proof was led in terms of the interlocutor of the First Division of 14th July 1876. The result of the evidence will appear from the opinion of Lord Mure.

The Lord Ordinary, on 9th February 1877, having considered the proof, repelled the defences, and pronounced decree of reduction as craved.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action to set aside a policy of life assurance, and is based on a breach of the conditions on which it was issued, viz., that the answers given by the assured to queries submitted to him, and the declaration, forming with these answers part of his proposal for insurance, were true. The particulars in which these are alleged to be false are specified on record, and I need not repeat or summarise them. The relevancy of the action is undoubted, and the only question is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain it in fact. At the conclusion of the evidence, and after hearing counsel for the parties, my strong impression was that the pursuers had proved their case—so strong, indeed, that in an ordinary case I should not have hesitated to act upon it by giving judgment at once. But to reduce a policy of insurance upon a post mortem inquiry regarding the habits of the assured, and the bodily ailments with which he may have been afflicted prior to the insurance, is not an ordinary or common-place matter, and I accordingly delayed judgment until I had recon-

No. 165. The defenders reclaimed.¹
At advising,—

July 13, 1877.
Scottish
Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.

LORD MURE.—In this action of reduction, which has been brought by the sidered my impression with such aid to my memory and notes as the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence might give me.

"As my judgment on the whole matter is in favour of the insurance office, it is, I think, all the more proper that I should say distinctly that in my opinion a policy ought not to be easily set aside upon a comparison of the result of what I have characterised as a post mortem inquiry into a man's habits and bodily ailments, and the answers which he has given to the queries answered in his proposal for insurance. With respect to sober and temperate habits, in particular, I should certainly not be induced to hold an answer false, and a breach of condition by evidence of habitual generous living or even of occasional excess. Nor with respect to disease, or ailments short of what are generally called diseases, should I consider it material that the assured had in his answers and declaration altogether omitted to notice several trifling illnesses and even several temporary bodily troubles arising from folly or indiscretion. A man is not, for anything I now decide, and I think really is not, obliged, as a condition of insuring his life on the terms usually exacted by insurance offices, to make a minute confession of his sins and misfortunes, and their effects on his health, provided these affects, though they occasioned temporary inconvenience, with more or less anxiety, have passed away without results from which permanent or lasting injury to health is reasonably to be apprehended. I express this opinion only to guard more distinctly against the supposition that anything to the contrary is involved in the decision which I now pronounce, for the facts as proved really present no such case for consideration. I mean, however, to express my opinion distinctly to this effect—that an insurance office challenging a policy after the death of the assured on the ground of untrue answers to queries, and untrue declaration made by him regarding his health and habits of life, undertakes a heavy onus, to the discharge of which it must be strictly held. I do not go the length of saying that gross and wilful falsehood must be proved. But, first, the falsehood must be clear, and on a subject which is or reasonably may be material to the risk; and, second, if not wilful, it must be inexcusable in this sense—that it consists in a blameably reckless or careless assertion or omission of which an honest man giving ordinary attention to the matter in hand would not have been guilty, and which in fairness to the office which was deceived cannot be treated and passed over as immaterial or trifling. There may be and no doubt are cases in which these propositions would require qualification or modification, and I only submit them as sufficient for the case immediately before me.

"My judgment on the evidence is that the answers and declaration of the assured were wilfully false in the several respects specified by the pursuers or record. Short of this, and as a milder view of the assured's conduct in the matter, I am of opinion that his answers and declaration were false in fact, and inexcusable so in the sense which I have explained. I have arrived at this conclusion on a careful consideration of the evidence with reference to the heavy onus that lay on the pursuers according to the opinion which I have already expressed. I made a precis of the evidence for my own use, but do not think that it would be useful to enter upon any examination of the evidence here.

"I therefore repel the defences, sustain the reasons of reduction, and decree as concluded for, with expenses. The pursuers do not seek to avail themselves of the clause forfeiting to them the premiums which they have received.

¹ Authorities.—Watson v. Mainwaring, 1813, 4 Taunton, 763; Rose v. Blandshaw, 1 Wm. Blackstone, 312; Life Association of Scotland v. Foster, Jan. 31, 1873, 11 Macph. 351, 45 Scot. Jur. 240; James v. The Provincial Insurance Company, 1857, 3 Scott's C. B. Rep., new series, 65.

Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Company against the assignees to a policy of insurance issued by the pursuers in May 1872 on the life of the late George Moir, the pursuers seek to have the policy reduced, on the ground that false statements and misrepresentations were made by Moir in answer to the questions put to him when he proposed to insure his life. The document which contains these answers is headed "Proposal," and the declaration attached to it, and which was signed by the assured, bears that it is to be "the basis of the contract" between him and the insurance company; and that "if any untrue averment is contained in this declaration, or in the answers above given, or if it shall hereafter appear that any of the matters above set forth have not been truly and fairly stated," the policy to be issued "shall be absolutely null and void."

No. 165.
July 13, 1877.
Scottish
Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.

The pursuers have set forth on the record various particulars as to which that document is said to contain false statements; and in the defences lodged, not for the assured or his executors, but for his assignees, various pleas in law applicable to the defenders' position as assignees were stated in defence, in respect of which it was maintained that the pursuers were not entitled to succeed in the present action. These defences, which were chiefly of a preliminary nature, and went to the exclusion of all proof, were before the Court in July 1876, and were disposed of after careful consideration. On the 14th of that month the 1st, 3d, 5th, 8th, and 11th pleas for the defenders were repelled,¹ and the case remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof. That proof has been led, and we have before us the judgment of the Lord Ordinary dealing with the case on the question of fact, being the main if not the only one which your Lordships have now to consider.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the facts averred by the pursuer have been established, and he has pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences, and decerning in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons. In the note of his opinion, after making some remarks on the question of onus, and without going into the detail of the evidence, the Lord Ordinary says,—“My judgment on the evidence is that the answers and declaration of the assured were wilfully false in the several respects specified by the pursuers on record. Short of this, and as a milder view of the assured's conduct in the matter, I am of opinion that his answers and declaration were false in fact, and inexcusably so in the sense which I have explained. I have arrived at this conclusion on a careful consideration of the evidence, with reference to the heavy onus that lay on the pursuers, according to the opinion which I have already expressed.” The question, therefore, which we have now to consider is, whether the Lord Ordinary's views as to the evidence are sound?

There are three leading points on which the pursuers maintain that false and wilfully false statements were made by the assured. First, as to his general habits in the matter of sobriety and temperance; secondly, as to the state of his notwithstanding the now declared invalidity of the policy, and stated their readiness to return them. This is not only becoming, and what was to be expected, but is probably only consistent with the form of action which the pursuers adopted, and the decree of total reduction which they have asked and obtained. However this may be, it will be quite understood that the pursuers agree to complete restoration and make return of the premiums accordingly.”

¹ Vide, ante, vol. iii. p. 1078.

No. 165. health; and thirdly, as to what transactions he had had with other insurance companies prior to the proposal in question.

July 13, 1877.

Scottish

Equitable Life

Assurance

Society v.

Buist, &c.

In the proposal required by the pursuers to be submitted to them these questions occur—(Reads 5th, 9th, and 15th questions quoted supra, p. 1076-7). Having carefully examined the evidence I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary on these three points :—

(1) As regards the habits of the assured, it is in my opinion very clearly proved that at the time these answers were given in the deceased was a man of intemperate habits, and that he had been so for a considerable period. The proposal was made on the 12th of May 1872, and it is distinctly proved that during the years 1870 and 1871 his intemperance had reached such a pitch that he was more than once under treatment for delirium tremens. I can have no doubt of this after the evidence of Dr Joseph Bell, who speaks to two if not three severe attacks during that period. But it is also, I think, proved by the people in whose house the assured lodged; and the treatment which he then underwent is inconsistent with any other ailment. It is plain therefore that when the assured answered the fifth question in the proposal in the affirmative he wilfully made a false statement as to his habits of life. (2) As to the question of health it is proved that from 1869 to the spring of 1871 he was suffering from syphilis as set forth on the record. James Nisbet, in the employment of Mr Hannah, chemist, Calton Street, to whose shop the assured was in the habit of going for his medicines, and Dr Sinclair, are both distinct on this point, and equally distinct as to the assured's knowledge that it was syphilis from which he was suffering. The people in whose house he lodged understood that he was suffering from that disease; and Dr Joseph Bell depones that he warned the deceased to the effect his habits would have upon his health, and went so far as to tell him on 15th May 1872 that he was then suffering from the disease in its secondary or even tertiary stage, and that he must inform the Standard Insurance Company, who had referred a proposal of assurance to Dr Bell, that his life was not insurable. Dr Bell's answer to the Standard Company appears to have been written in Moir's presence on the 15th of May, which was three days after the proposal had been made by Moir to the pursuers' company. But then the policy now in question was not delivered to Moir until the 22d of May. So that when he received the policy he knew that a statement had been made to the Standard Insurance Company, by his regular medical attendant, to the effect that his life was not insurable, owing to the condition of his health. I think, therefore, that as to the matter of health, concealment, and wilful concealment, on the part of the assured of a disorder tending to impair the constitution is proved. (3) On the last point, viz., as to transactions with other offices, there can be no doubt, for the assured was not only in treaty with the Standard Insurance Company as above mentioned, but he had shortly before been in treaty with three other offices. In August 1871 he had effected an insurance with the Scottish Widows' Fund. In March 1872 he had made a proposal to the Scottish Amicable Assurance Society, which was afterwards dropped. Later on in 1872, viz., in the month of April, he made a proposal to the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company which was declined. And on the 5th April 1872 he had also made a proposal to the General Life Assurance Company which was accepted, and on which a policy was issued in June of that year. There is therefore positive proof that he was transacting, or had transacted, with four other insurance companies at the time he gave the answer to the fifteenth question in the proposal made to the pursuers. No. 165.

I have had no difficulty therefore in coming to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary upon the import of the evidence; and I am of opinion that his Lordship's judgment on that main question should be adhered to.

July 13, 1877.
Scottish
Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.

But another point has been argued before us, which does not appear to have been raised before the Lord Ordinary, viz., whether in consequence of some suspicions which were thrown on the life of the assured during the currency of the policy, which the pursuers took no steps to investigate, and of which they did not inform the defenders as assignees to the policy, the pursuers are now barred from insisting in this action, or are, at any rate, bound to refund the premiums which they received. Now, upon the evidence adduced, I do not think that it is proved that anything more than mere rumour ever reached the pursuers, and of such a kind that they could not with propriety take cognisance of it. I am of opinion therefore that the defenders have failed to prove facts necessary to instruct this very special defence, and I think it right to add, that I have considerable doubts whether there is, upon the record in this case, any averments relevant to raise the defence; and that is, in all probability, the reason why it is not referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion.

LORD DEAS and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely concur. There can be no question that this policy of insurance was obtained by gross and deliberate fraud.

A point has, however, been raised by the defenders, of the nature of a plea in bar. What is averred on record by the defenders is, that the material facts now bounded on were known to the pursuers, at least before receiving any premiums of assurance from the defenders, who had in good faith advanced certain sums of money on the security of the policy, and intimated an assignation of it to the pursuers, and that the premiums were afterwards received by the pursuers without any intimation to the defenders that the policy would be repudiated on Mr Moir's death, or at least that the premiums were received by the pursuers after they had been put on their inquiry and had ample means of ascertaining the facts.

This defence, however, even if it be a sufficient defence, is not supported by evidence. All that is proved is that certain rumours came to the ears of certain of the officers of the pursuers' company that raised or should have raised their suspicions. But these rumours were of the vaguest possible nature. Nothing could have been more rash and ill-advised than that the company on such information should have intimated to anybody concerned a challenge or anything approaching a challenge of the policy. I do not know exactly what it is that the defenders suggest was the duty of the company in the circumstances alleged. Were they instantly to raise an action of reduction, or were they to refuse further premiums, and announce that they held themselves no longer bound by the policy? Either would have been a most rash and impolitic course, and might have involved them in very serious liabilities to the insured as well as to the assignees, which was certainly not justified by the information before the company at the time.

If after a policy has been assigned the insurance company become aware of objections to its validity, so clear and conclusive that the mere statement of

- No. 165. them is enough, I do not say that there may not then be a duty of communication to those whom the company know to be interested in the policy. It would not be consistent with good faith that they should, in such circumstances, go on receiving the premiums on a policy that they intended to challenge in the end. But there is nothing approaching such a case here, and therefore we need not consider the question.
- July 13, 1877.
Scottish
Equitable Life
Assurance
Society v.
Buist, &c.

THE COURT adhered.

J. A. CAMPBELL & LAMOND, C.S.—JAMES M'CAUL, S.S.C.—Agents.

- No. 166. JOHN BRACK BOYD AND OTHERS (W. B. Boyd's Marriage-contract Trustees); First Parties.—Asher—Darling.
July 13, 1877. MRS ELIZABETH BELL WILSON OR BOYD AND HUSBAND, Second Parties.
Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd.
—Balfour—Low.

Marriage-Contract—Clause of Conquest.—Held that life interests and annuities to which a married woman became entitled during the subsistence of the marriage did not fall under a general conveyance of acquirenda by her to the trustees under her antenuptial contract, such a clause being read only as referring to principal sums.

- 2D DIVISION.
R. BY antenuptial contract, dated June 1862, between William Brack Boyd and Elizabeth Bell Wilson, the latter, in consideration of the portions made to her by her intended husband, assigned, disposed, transferred, and conveyed to certain persons therein named as trustees a sum of £2000 then belonging to her, "and also all and sundry other estate and effects which she, the said Elizabeth Bell Wilson, may conquest and acquire during the subsistence of the said marriage, by purchase, succession, bequest or otherwise, provided the same shall amount to £300 sterling or upwards. By the purposes of the trust the income out of the trust-estate was made payable to the said Elizabeth Wilson during the subsistence of the marriage, the whole or one-half of the fee of the trust-estate being settled on the children of the marriage, according as the husband or the wife predeceased."

The marriage took place, and there were four children thereof.

By a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 1850, and which was referred to in Mr and Mrs Boyd's marriage-contract, the late James Wilson of Otterburn, father of Mrs Boyd, bequeathed to her "the interest of £3000, declaring that the said interest should be payable to his said daughter, exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband whom she might marry, and that the receipts for the same to be granted by her alone should be valid and sufficient to the receiver thereof without the consent of her said husband."

Mr Wilson died before his daughter's marriage, and was succeeded in the estate of Otterburn by his son John Wilson, who died in 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1868, whereby he directed his trustees to pay over the whole free annual proceeds of the residue of his estate to his sister, Mrs Boyd, until her eldest son should have attained the age of twenty-one, when her interest in the trust-estate should be restricted to an annuity of £300, "declaring that the said William Brack Boyd shall have no concern with the rents, interests, and profits of the said residue of my estate and effects or with the said annuity in virtue of his jus mariti or any other title whatever, and that the same shall not be liable to his debts or deeds, nor subjected to the legal diligence of his creditors, but that notwithstanding it shall be in the power of the said Mrs Elizabeth Bell Wilson or Brack Boyd, by herself alone, without the consent of her husband, to uplift and discharge the rents, interests, and profits of said residue, and the said annuity, and her receipts and discharges therefor shall be sufficient." No. 166.

The free annual income derived from the residue of John Wilson's estate was about £1500 a-year. July 13, 1877.
Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd.

The marriage-contract trustees for some years allowed Mrs Boyd to receive payment of the interest of the sum of £3000 from her father's estate, and also of the free annual income of the residue of her brother's estate from his trustees. Doubts, however, arose as to whether under the provisions of the marriage-contract they were justified in doing so, and a special case was presented to the Court by the marriage-contract trustees of the first part, and Mrs Boyd and her husband of the second part. The trustees maintained that, on a sound construction of the marriage-contract, the said interest and income (and the annuity of £300 when such should become payable) formed part of the estate and effects conquered and acquired by Mrs Boyd during the subsistence of the marriage, and that the same ought therefore to be paid over to them, to be by them capitalised for the purposes of the trust, and only the interest thence arising to be paid to the spouses.

Mrs Boyd and her husband maintained, on the other hand, that these annual provisions did not fall to the trustees, but that the terms of the marriage-contract with regard to acquirenda applied to principal sums only, and were not intended to include any right which Mrs Boyd might acquire to the interest of a capital sum or to an annuity.

The questions submitted to the Court were—“(1) Whether the parties hereto of the first part are entitled to demand that the interest of the sum of £3000 provided to Mrs Boyd by her father's settlement shall be paid over to them for the purposes of the trust created by the said marriage-contract? (2) Whether the parties hereto of the first part are entitled to demand that the annual income of the residue of the estate of the deceased John Wilson, and the annuity of £300 when it arises, shall be paid over to them for the purposes of the said trust? (3) In the event of the two preceding questions, or either of them, being answered in the affirmative, whether the parties hereto of the first part are bound to pay the said interest and income, or either of them, and the annuity when it arises, to Mrs Boyd as income, or to capitalise the said interest and income, or either of them, and the annuity, when it arises, by selling the same to an insurance office or otherwise.”

Argued for the trustees;—The words of the dispositive clause were unquestionably sufficient to cover any sums which Mrs Boyd should succeed to, provided the same amounted (i.e., amounted in all) to £300. Incidentally, the exclusion of small sums supported the universality of the clause. If the trust-conveyance had been one for behoof of creditors it would have been impossible to contend that the funds in question did not fall under the assignation, and there was no reason for applying a different principle of construction to such a conveyance in a marriage-contract. It was not, indeed, disputed that a testator might taint upon a bequest such a personal character as to exclude the trustees. This was all that was decided in the English cases quoted on the other side. If there had been in the settlements of Mrs Boyd's father and brother expressions clearly indicating that the funds bequeathed should not fall under the trust, they must have received effect. But there were no such indications of intention to be found in these deeds. There was no reported decision of the Court of Session having much bearing on the question, but the opinion of Professor M. Bell was in favour of the view submitted by the trustees.¹

¹ Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, vol. ii. 903, 2d edition (846, 1st edition).

No. 166. Argued for Mr and Mrs Boyd;—(1) Apart from any indication in the deed conferring the provision a life-interest or annuity was not comprehended in a clause of conquest such as the present. The object of the conveyance to the trustees in the marriage-contract was to secure the capital sum or stock, the annual fruits of which were to be enjoyed by the spouses, and accordingly there was no ground for making the clause applicable to annual fruits, the stock producing which was already secured, and, if possible, still less to an annuity. This was recognised as law in England, and was in accordance with reason.¹ If the interest, as it accrued, vested in the trustees, and fell to be capitalised by them, it followed (supposing there were no exclusion of small sums) that the interest of the interest must be dealt with in the same manner, and so on. A power to accumulate was not to be presumed. (2) There were indications in the settlement of Mrs Boyd's father and brother that the funds bequeathed by them should be personal to Mrs Boyd, and not pass to the marriage-contract trustees.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had an able argument, but my first impression of the case was that there was not much doubt what the decision should be, and now that we have heard all the authorities I am very clearly of opinion that this impression was right. It is not necessary to go into the details of these instruments, as I think that the principle on which the case should be decided admits of being stated in very general terms. I am of opinion that when a clause of conquest in a marriage-contract mentions “estate,” “property,” “effects,”—it signifies estate in fee, the capital stock which bears fruits. The scope of the contract is that the wife undertakes to secure the capital by a trust, while she is to have the fruits during her life. It is reasonable to infer that property coming to the wife, which is not a right of fee, is not comprehended in the trust-conveyance. The meaning is that the trustees shall hold the corpus, saltem substantia, of the wife's property. But if the corpus is in the hands of others there is no necessity for protection, seeing that there is no capital which might be dissipated. There could be no better illustration of this than an annuity. The trust-conveyance in the marriage-contract never can comprehend estate, the very nature of which implies annual enjoyment. That general view is sufficient for the decision of the cause, and I am the more fortified in this view that Lord Hatherley lays it down as settled that life-interests and annuities do not fall under such covenants.² The case of *Briggs v. White*³ was precisely the same as the present, for the life-interest in that case fell quite as much under the terms of the marriage-settlement as the £1500 a-year in the present case.

The whole tenor of this marriage-contract clearly corroborates the view which I have stated, for incidentally, I may almost say accidentally, the word “principal” slips into the marriage-contract as applicable to conquest. The trustees are directed to invest a sum of £2000 contributed by the wife, “or other principal sums conquest as aforesaid;” and again they are empowered to advance the said sums, “or other principal sums conquest as aforesaid,” from which I draw the conclusion that my interpretation of the dispositive clause is correct, and applies to the corpus, the fruits of which are to be reaped by the wife, and that where the trustees do not hold the corpus the trust-conveyance does not apply. No. 166.

¹ In re Mainwaring's Settlement, June 1866, L. R. 2 Eq. 487 (Vice-Chancellor Page Wood's judgment, 496); St Aubyn v. Humphreys, April 1856, 22 Beavan, 175; White v. Briggs, July 15, 1848, reported in note, 22 Beavan, 176; Townshend v. Harrowby, March 18, 1858, 27 L. J., N. S. Q. B. 176.

² In re Mainwaring's Settlement, June 1866, L. R., 2 Eq. 487.

³ July 15, 1848, reported 22 Beavan, 176, note.

There is a second ground of judgment which might also be sufficient. By July 13, 1877. Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd.
John Wilson's settlement, the husband is entirely excluded from the bequest. The husband is the creditor in the marriage-contract, and it necessarily follows from the special exclusion of his rights in John Wilson's deed that he cannot enforce the provisions of the marriage-contract quoad this bequest. That is one of the grounds on which Lord Hatherley founded in the case of Mainwaring.

On the whole, then, I am of opinion,—(1) That from the nature of the fund itself, apart from any indications on the part of the testator, it does not fall under the marriage-contract trust; and (2) That from the words of John Wilson's deed the husband's rights are entirely excluded from that £1500 a-year.

This annual income is to be restricted, as soon as the eldest son shall attain majority, to an annuity of £300. I cannot bring myself by any process of reasoning to hold that an annuity falls under such a clause of conquest.

I do not think it necessary to go into the distinctions between the terms of the bequest in John Wilson's deed and those of the bequest of the interest of £3000 in the father's deed, because the clause excluding the husband's rights is not substantially different in the two deeds.

I propose therefore that we should answer the first and second questions in the negative, and find it unnecessary to answer the third question.

LORD ORMDALE and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“(1 and 2) Find that the parties hereto of the first part are not entitled to demand that the interest of the sum of £3000, provided to Mrs Boyd by her father's settlement, shall be paid over to them for the purposes of the trust, nor are they entitled to demand that the annual income of the residue of the estate of the deceased John Wilson, and the annuity of £300 when it arises, shall be paid over to them for the purposes of the said trust: (3) Find it unnecessary to answer this query, and decern.”

JAMES STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM M'GIBBON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Scott.
WILLIAM THOMSON, Defender and Respondent.—Balfour—
J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 167.

July 14, 1877.
M'Gibbon v.
Thomson.

Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40, Vict. c. 70), sec. 20—Decree by Default.
—In an action in the Sheriff Court the Sheriff-substitute assoltized the defender in respect of no appearance by or on behalf of the pursuer at the diet of proof. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and represented that his failure to appear was caused by the illness of his procurator, and a mistake on the part of his clerk. The Sheriff adhered, and the Court refused an appeal.

Observed, that parties are sufficiently protected from hardship by the appeal to the Sheriff, who can receive explanations, and, if necessary, institute an inquiry, and that the Court will not lightly interfere with his discretion.

In an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, by W. M'Gibbon, 1st Division.
merchant, Stranraer, against W. Thomson, commercial traveller, Glasgow, Sheriff of for payment of £38, the amount of a bill, the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) Lanarkshire. appointed 2d May 1877 as a diet of proof. On that day he pronounced M.
this interlocutor:—“The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' procurators, and the defender having stated that he has no other witnesses in

No. 167. attendance, but that he intended to examine the pursuer, who he thought would be present, discharges the diet of proof assigned for to-day, and in lieu thereof assigns Wednesday, the 23d day of May, at ten o'clock forenoon, as a diet for proof in the cause, at which diet allows the defender to examine himself as a witness, and the pursuer if duly cited for that diet."

July 14, 1877.
M'Gibbon v.
Thomson.

On 23d May the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of no appearance by or for the pursuer at the diet of proof to-day, holds him confessed as not insisting in the action; and, on defender's craving, sustains the defences: Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Clark), who adhered.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. It was stated for him that his procurator had been confined by illness, and that his clerk had neglected to observe the diet of 23d May.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very important point in the practice of the Sheriff Courts. We must not leave out of view what the great object of the recent statute was, and what mischiefs it was intended to remedy. The great evil was the excessive delay in Sheriff Court procedure which arose from the agents having it in their power to consent to prorogations. The object of the Act was to take away that power, and to arm the Sheriff with power to go on, and to compel the parties to go on whether they like or not, and, accordingly, the 19th section provides that "it shall not be competent of consent of parties to prorate the time for complying with any statutory enactment or order of the Sheriff, whether with reference to the making up and closing of the record, appointing a diet of proof, diet of debate, or otherwise."

These are extremely important provisions, and, I hope, are carried out strictly. In exactly the same spirit and for the same end is the 20th section. The result of it is, that failure to attend any diet is followed by these consequences. If both parties fail to attend, the case goes out of Court. If one party fails, the judgment is to pass in favour of the other. This is made imperative unless a sufficient reason appears to the contrary. The question whether there is a sufficient reason is, of course, in the first instance, for the consideration of the Sheriff-substitute, if it is before him that the diet takes place. He must act as prescribed by this section, whatever the amount of his knowledge of the circumstances may be, if one of the parties is absent.

I have no doubt that it was not intended to prevent an appeal. It is plain enough that the Sheriff-substitute might not be aware of the reasons which would explain the default. There might be many cases in which it could be accounted

* "NOTE.—In this case it was strongly urged for the pursuer that his non-attendance on 23d May 1877 arose from an innocent mistake, and it may be that something might be said in that respect. I do not, however, consider myself at liberty, unless some very strong ground indeed is made out, to recall an interlocutor such as that under review, pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute after a full knowledge of the facts. Sec. 20 of the present Sheriff Court Act is very specific in its provisions, and if every excuse were to be taken as a ground for recalling interlocutors pronounced in accordance with that section it may as well be held pro non scripto. That is my reading of the Act, and if I have fallen into a mistake of undue strictness I shall be glad to be directed by the Supreme Court as to the proper construction of the provision in question, and will endeavour to follow out such directions to the best of my ability."

for sufficiently, but no one might be there to account for it. It would be an unreasonable and strained construction of the clause to hold that a sufficient excuse, if proved afterwards, should not be received. It is reasonable that the party should have an appeal to the Sheriff, to whom he can explain fully the nature of his excuse. No. 167.
July 14, 1877.
M'Gibbon v. Thomson.

Accordingly an appeal was taken in this case. But what is the state of the facts? On 2d May the Sheriff-substitute, having both parties before him, assigned the 23d as a diet of proof, "at which diet allows the defender to examine himself as a witness, and the pursuer if duly cited for that diet."

On the 23d, accordingly, the defender appeared. He had not cited the pursuer, and, therefore, he had shewn that he did not mean to examine him. But the defender appeared, and whether he meant to examine himself we cannot tell, or whether he intended to ask for absolvitor without examining any witnesses. In either case it was indispensable that the pursuer should be present, and he had been ordered to be present by himself or his procurator by the interlocutor of 2d May. But nobody was there to represent him. In these circumstances I do not see that the Sheriff-substitute could have done anything but what he did. But the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and his view of the case is very distinctly stated in his note.

There is a great deal of force in the Sheriff's observations. If everything that could be represented as an innocent mistake were to be accepted as an excuse the clause would be in great peril of being set at nought.

It would be very easy to get up the aspect of an innocent mistake—which would really mean an explanation by the procurator or his clerk, not an inquiry—and we know how an explanation can be coloured so as to look plausible, though there has really been negligence. It was negligence that was intended to be punished, and the Sheriff seems to have satisfied himself that there was that amount of negligence which not only justified the Sheriff-substitute in doing what he had no alternative but to do, but justified the Sheriff in refusing to admit the excuse.

It was represented that the procurator was for a considerable time confined by illness, and that his clerk neglected to observe that the diet was fixed for the 23d. That is precisely the same thing as if the procurator himself had been guilty of that failure of observation,—and is that not negligence and fault? It is just the kind of negligence and fault which was intended to be stopped by this stringent clause. I wish to say, at the same time, that even if this were not so plain a case, I should have great hesitation in interfering with the discretion of the Sheriff. He has the best means of discovering the truth. He has the procurators before him, and if he thinks it necessary he can institute an inquiry. We have not the same facilities, and unless a party comes here with a very distinct allegation of a reasonable excuse which is capable of being proved directly I do not think it would be safe for us to interfere. I do not say there might not be such a case. But I am quite clear that the present case is not of that character.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the appeal should be refused. The purpose of the enactment is to prevent the delay and expense of adjournments caused by the neglect of agents to attend at diets of the Court, at which their attendance is necessary for procedure in the cause.

No. 167.

July 14, 1877.
M'Gibbon v.
Thomson.

The Sheriff-substitute had no choice but to assoilzie the defender, for there was no appearance for the pursuer at an important diet of proof, and no reason for refraining to give effect to the express provision of the statute. Cases may occur of the absence of a party, for which, within the knowledge of the Sheriff-substitute or on information before him, there may be a sufficient reason, and in which the severe consequences of the statute would not take effect, but that was not the case here. I entertain no doubt that on appeal the Sheriff might recall an interlocutor so pronounced. But I am equally clear that that is not to be lightly done; and if it appears that the default was in consequence of such neglect as left no sufficient reason or ground of excuse to account for the parties' absence, then no ground for recall of the interlocutor is made out. I accept this case as one in which the Sheriff, in full knowledge of the facts, after hearing an explanation from the pursuer's procurator, thought that his non-attendance was the result of such neglect as I have spoken of, and that therefore there was no ground for opening up the case.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

A. KELLY MORISON, S.S.C.—MACRAE & FLETT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 168.

GEORGE LEES, Petitioner and Appellant.—Crichton—Guthrie Smith—R. V. Campbell.

July 14, 1877.
Lees v. Marr
Typefounding
Company.

THE MARR TYPEFOUNDING COMPANY (LIMITED) AND MRS JANET B. MARR.
Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—Jameson.

Lease—Petition for Judicial Inspection of Premises.—Held that a petition by the landlord for judicial inspection of premises which the tenants were taken bound to keep in repair, with a conclusion for the expense of the repairs which the tenants should be found bound to execute in implement of the lease, was a competent and proper proceeding, although presented upwards of a year before what the landlord averred was the termination of the lease, the tenants having vacated the premises and taken up the position that the lease was at an end.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian and Haddington.
I.

ON 27th March 1876 George Lees, LL.D., proprietor of certain premises in New Street, Canongate, Edinburgh, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, setting forth that in 1862 he had let the said premises to James Marr, typefounder, for five years, that the lease had been renewed from time to time in favour of Mr Marr, and his widow Mrs Janet B. Marr, the last renewal being for five years from Whitsunday 1872, thereby extending the term of the lease to Whitsunday 1877; that in 1874 Mrs Marr had assigned the lease and disposed of the business and plant to the Marr Typefounding Company (Limited); that some months before the petition was presented the Marr Typefounding Company had removed from the premises, taking with them all, or nearly all, of their plant and fittings; that the lease contained a clause by which the tenants "declare that the premises as at present occupied by them are in a good and sufficient state of repair for the purpose of the business carried on by them therein, and they undertake to keep and leave them in like condition at the expiry of this tack, excepting always from this obligation such damage as may necessarily be occasioned by the removal of the foresaid benches or other fittings used in the business of the foundry; but in the event of any extraordinary repairs being necessary, such as the falling in of a roof or walls, the said George Lees and the foresaids shall be at the expense of such extraordinary repairs;" that notwithstanding this obligation the respondents had allowed the premises to become much dilapidated; that the petitioner had called upon them to put the same in proper order and repair under the tack, or to concur with him in appointing a man of skill as referee to inspect and report upon the premises, but that they had refused. He therefore prayed the Sheriff to appoint a man of skill to inspect the premises foresaid, to hear parties, and report thereon to your Lordship, and if it shall be found on considering the said report, or such other procedure as your Lordship shall see fit to adopt, that the respondents or either of them have not implemented and fulfilled the obligations undertaken by them under the said lease, and renewals thereof from time to time, as above specified, to decern and ordain them at the sight of such men of skill to make the said repairs, or failing their doing so to authorise the petitioner to execute the same at the expense of the respondents, and to decern against them or either of them for the expenses of such repairs, as those may be ascertained in the course of the process to follow hereon: And farther, to find the respondents liable to the petitioner in the expenses of this application, and whole warrants and procedure to follow hereon, and to decern therefor."

No. 168.

July 14, 1877.
 Lees v. Marr
 Typefoundry
 Company.

A record was made up, in which the respondents stated substantially that the lease had been brought to a close before the petition was presented, in terms of an agreement by which the landlord, as they said, consented, upon certain conditions, to depart from all claims under the lease. They also denied the petitioner's averments in regard to the dilapidation of the premises.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The petition is incompetent as laid, in respect that the said lease founded on has been brought to a termination before the raising of the action. (10) Assuming that the lease is still binding upon the respondents, or either of them, the petitioner is not entitled to the remedy craved until the natural expiry hereof.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced an interlocutor, which, after certain findings, proceeded:—"Before further answer, and under reservation of all pleas of parties, remits to Mr Robert Morham junior, architect, Edinburgh, to inspect the premises referred to in the petition, to report whether the same are in a fit condition to carry on a type-founding business similar in all respects to that which has been lately carried on therein by the respondents and their authors, with a statement of the extent and cost of such repairs as may, in the reporter's opinion, be necessary for that purpose, and to report quam primum, reserving all question of expenses."

The respondents appealed to the Sheriff (Davidson), who pronounced his interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the petition is premature, and hoc statu incompetent: Therefore dismisses the petition: Finds the respondents entitled to expenses," &c.*

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The ground on which the respondents resisted the petition was that it was too late. They now turned round and said that it was too early. Whether the

* "NOTE.—The respondents say the lease is at an end, the whole obligations and rights of parties under it having been fixed by an arrangement in February 1876, by which the lease was terminated. On the other hand, the petitioner denies that, and avers that the lease is still subsisting, and that the respondents are still in possession, and that the payments made to him were not in virtue of an alleged arrangement, but simply two payments of half-yearly rents. If this be so, and the statement of the petitioner must, in dealing with his petition, be taken as correct, then, as the lease does not come to its natural termination till Whitsunday 1877, the petitioner is premature in his application in March 1876. And that he alleges to be wrong may be put right before the lease ends in 1877."

No. 168.

July 14, 1877.
Lees v. Marr
 Typefoundry
 Company.

petitioner or the respondents were right as to the term at which the lease ended, there was a dispute as to the point, and the landlord was clearly not bound to run the risk of losing his remedy of judicial inspection by delay.¹

The respondents maintained that the competency of the petition must be judged of upon the petitioner's averments, and that upon his own shewing there was at the date of the petition more than a year of the lease to run.

The Court, on 4th November 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against: Before answer, remit to Mr William Watherston, builder in Edinburgh, to report upon the existing state of repair of the subjects in dispute, reference being had to the statements of parties on record."

Mr Watherston reported that the appearance of the premises afforded evidence that they had been for many years in the same condition of repair as at the date of his inspection, except that there was a considerable excess of broken panes in the windows, and that the premises were as fit for carrying on a typefoundry business as they had been for many years previous. He subsequently, at the request of parties, fixed the sum payable for excess of broken glass at £12.

The debate was then resumed. Both parties claimed expenses, the respondents, on the ground that they had been successful on the merits, the averments of the petitioner having proved to be unfounded except as regards the trifling item for broken glass; the petitioner, on the ground that the greater part of the expenses had been incurred by the respondents maintaining that the petition was incompetent on grounds which were mutually destructive as well as erroneous in point of law.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As to the competency of the petition I have no doubt. It may be that where no action has been taken by the tenant the landlord is not entitled to have a judicial inspection till the close of the lease. But the answers of the respondents themselves make the position of matters quite distinct. In article 5 of his condescendence the petitioner avers that "some months ago" the respondents removed from the premises, taking with them nearly all their plant. The respondents' answer is,—“Admitted, and reference made to the respondents' statement of facts.” Then, in the 7th article of the petitioner's condescendence there is a specification of the damage, which he says the respondents are bound to make good. In their answer the respondents say,—“The said lease was terminated of consent on 29th February 1876, at all events before the raising of the present action,” and they again refer to their statement of facts, in which they give a detailed statement to the same effect. So that on the record there is an allegation by the respondents that they had given up the lease.

In these circumstances the landlord had no choice but to act as if that allegation were correct. I have no doubt that he was entitled to have the state of the premises judicially ascertained, for otherwise, in the event of the tenant's allegation as to the lease having terminated proving well founded, he might have been held to have cut himself out of his remedy by delay. The Sheriff's substitute was thus entirely right in making the remit. The respondents, however, appealed to the Sheriff, and he recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and dismissed the petition. The petitioner was thus unfortunately obliged to come here. We made a remit to Mr Watherston, and we have now his report. I confess that when we made the remit the petitioner's statements led me to expect that the damages would prove to be of a more extensive character than the are ascertained to be. On the whole, I think we should find the petitioner entitled to expenses in this Court, and find no expenses due in the inferior Court.

¹ Baird v. Mount, July 3, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1176.

No. 168.

LORD ORMDALE and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

July 14, 1877.
Lees v. Marr
Typefoundry
Company.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, approve of the report by Mr Watherston, No. 36 of process, and in respect that payment of the sum of £12, mentioned in the report, has been tendered by the respondents to the appellant at the bar, find it unnecessary to pronounce any other judgment on the merits of the cause: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in this Court," &c.

D. TODD LEES, S.S.C.—G. C. BANKS, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES GARDNER, Petitioner.—Kinnear—Lorimer.

No. 169.

EDWARD A. LUCAS AND OTHERS (Beresford's Trustees), Respondents.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

July 17, 1877.
Gardner v.
Beresford's
Trustees.

Leave to Appeal to the House of Lords.—In an action raised by a landlord for reduction of a lease of a quarry, on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud, and for removal and accounting, the tenant pleaded that in the event of his lease being reduced he was entitled to retain possession of the quarry under a separate agreement with the landlord. A jury found that the landlord had been induced to grant the lease by fraud, and thereafter the Court reduced the lease and repelled the tenant's plea that he was entitled to retain possession, and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the conclusions for accounting. On the defender applying for leave to appeal it was granted, on condition that he found caution for violent profits, and that the petition of appeal was presented and an order of service obtained thereon within eight days.

Landlord and Tenant—Violent Profits.—Observed, by the Lord President, that violent profits consisted in all that the pursuer could have made of the subject if he had been in possession, and all the damage done to the subject by the defender.

Supra, p. 363 and p. 885.

1st DIVISION.
B.

This was a petition by James Gardner for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against a unanimous judgment of the First Division pronounced on 13th June 1877. As the judgment was interlocutory it was necessary to obtain the leave of the Court under sec. 15 of 48 Geo. III. c. 151.

Argued for petitioner;—If he succeeded in getting the interlocutor reversed, so far as it dealt with the third plea in law (supra, p. 885), he would be entitled to remain in possession of the quarry. If he was not allowed to appeal at the present stage he never could resume possession, but all that could be given would be a new possession under a different lease. This could not be done under the present action. It would be very inconvenient for him to be turned out, and no prejudice would arise to the respondents by his remaining until the case was finally decided. The petitioner was solvent, and the respondents might recover any damage they might sustain from his being allowed to remain.

Argued for respondents;—It had been finally settled by the verdict of the jury that the lease was obtained by fraud, and the petitioner ought not to be allowed to continue to possess under it. Even though the defender might be entitled to obtain possession under the agreement he was not entitled to continue the possession which he obtained on the faith of the lease which had been reduced. If an appeal was now allowed there might be another appeal when the question of accounting was decided. The more convenient course was that the whole cause should be appealed after a final judgment.

No. 169.

July 17, 1877.
Gardner v.
Beresford's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—An application of this kind is addressed to the discretion of the Court, and it is sometimes very difficult to say whether it is more expedient to grant or to refuse leave to appeal. I am very much inclined in most cases where the cause is not exhausted to lean to the side of refusing to grant the leave unless the interference of the Court is clearly expedient. It is apt to cause an interruption to the final disposal of the action. But here there is a great peculiarity, because, as Mr Kinnear very pointedly observed, if the leave now asked is not granted there never can be an appeal, and all that a judgment of the House of Lords could give would be a restitution of the lessee's possession, not under the lease by which he at present possesses, but under another and a different lease. I do not think that the pursuers have any great interest to resist the application, provided they are secured against any loss consequent on continuance of possession. If caution is found for violent profits they will be amply secured, because violent profits embrace not only all profits which the pursuers could make if they were in possession, but also all damages which the subject may receive at the hands of the defender. One cannot conceive any other loss which can arise to the pursuers if the application is granted.

Besides, the interruption in the progress of the case is not of so much consequence here as in many cases. The accounting may perhaps occupy some time, and it is not a thing requiring any great hurry in the settlement. The defender, so far as we know, is quite solvent, and therefore the delay which will occur cannot create any prejudice to the pursuers. I therefore think we may grant leave to appeal if the defender will lodge in process a bond of caution for violent profits; and also under the distinct understanding that he will present his appeal to the House of Lords within a certain short time. Probably eight days should be the limit, as Parliament is now sitting.

LORD DEAS.—The specialty on which the respondents found against granting leave to appeal at this stage is the fact that the lease which has been reduced was obtained by fraud. But the question to be raised in the appeal is whether our judgment giving effect to that specialty is right. The defender says—True, my title has been reduced on the ground of fraud, but I had two titles, and I possessed on both of them, and I ought not to be turned out of possession until it has been found that one title is bad as well as the other. Our judgment, no doubt, was unanimous, but that is just the reason why leave to appeal is necessary. We may have been wrong in that judgment. It may be held that there are two titles,—that the defender is in possession under both, and ought not to be removed. These are considerations against granting leave to appeal. But, on the other hand, if the conditions which your Lordship has suggested are complied with—if the petitioner finds caution for violent profits, and undertakes to present his appeal within a given time—these considerations are to a great extent obviated, and I am in that view favourable to granting the leave asked.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

CAUTION for violent profits having been found by the petitioner the Court, on 17th July, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of caution for violent profits having now been found, in terms of bond, No. 27 of process, grant leave to the petitioner, James Gardner, to appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutor of this Court of 13th June 1877, as prayed for, on condition of the petition of appeal being presented and an order of service obtained thereon within eight days from this date."

ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 169.

July 17, 1877.
Gardner v.
Beresford's
Trustees.

HECTOR MACFIE AND OTHERS (Duncan's Trustees), First Parties.—

M'Laren—Darling.

No. 170.

JOHN ABBEY ELLISON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Asher—Moncreiff.

JANET DUNCAN M'CALLUM AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—M'Laren—

Darling.

July 17, 1877.

Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

Trust—Succession—Payments of income in anticipation of Vesting—Parent and Child—Provisions to Children.—Where trustees were directed to hold £5000 and shares of residue for behoof of a mother in liferent, and of such of her children as should reach the age of twenty-five years and the survivors in fee, and where these provisions had not at the death of the liferenter vested in any of the children by reason of none of them having reached that age, the Court held that the children as a class were entitled to the accruing income for their education and maintenance, it being admitted that the testator had placed himself in loco parentis to them, and that the advances were necessary.

MR JAMES DUNCAN, formerly merchant in Valparaiso, died in Rothesay on 21st October 1874, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 28th November 1867, and codicil dated 19th October 1874. Hector Macfie and others were appointed trustees and executors and tutors and curators to minor beneficiaries.

After various directions there came the following:—"In the seventh clause . . . (Third) I direct and appoint my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after my decease, to set aside and hold, and when opportunity offers to invest, in their own names, as trustees foresaid, the sum of £5000 sterling," and to pay the annual interest thereof to the testator's sister, Mary Duncan, if alive, and failing her to Mrs Maria Lyall or Ellison (who was an illegitimate daughter of a sister of the testator). Upon the decease of both ladies the trustees were to "hold the fee of the said sum of £5000 for behoof of such of the children of the said Maria Lyall or Ellison, whether by her present or any future marriage, as shall be then surviving, and shall have attained or shall afterwards attain the age of twenty-five years complete, and for behoof of the issue of any child or children who may have predeceased the cessation of said liferents, or, if there be no liferenter, who may have predeceased said last-mentioned term, or who may die before attaining the foresaid age leaving issue; and I direct and appoint my trustees to pay and divide said sum to and among said children and issue upon their respectively attaining the foresaid age of twenty-five years complete, the division being per stirpes." Four other sums of £5000 were also provided to various persons in liferent and fee.

In the ninth purpose the testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into five equal shares, of which two were to be invested and held for the liferent use of the testator's brother, Colin Duncan, and a niece, Miss Janet Duncan M'Callum, respectively, "and, with reference to the disposal of the fee of the said two shares, I direct and appoint my trustees, upon the decease of the said liferenters respectively, to divide the shares liferented by them respectively into three equal proportions, and to hold, apply, and dispose of the same according to the destination, and in the same way and manner in all respects (subject always to the provision as to vesting hereinafter written) as is hereinafter appointed with reference to the three remain-

No. 170.
July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

ing shares of said residue and remainder: But notwithstanding what is before written, I provide and declare that none of the proportions of said two shares, or any part thereof, shall become vested interests in the persons who may become entitled thereto until the same shall be paid over to them respectively." . . . "With reference to the disposal of the three remaining shares of the residue and remainder of my means and estate, I direct and appoint my trustees to hold, apply, and dispose of one of the said shares for behoof of the said Mary Duncan and Maria Lyall or Ellison, and the children of the said Maria Lyall or Ellison, and the issue of predeceasing children, for their respective rights of life rent and fee, . . . all in the same way and manner in all respects . . . as is hereinbefore provided with reference to the three several legacies of £5000 hereinbefore conceived in favour of the said persons."

Mr Duncan was survived by the two life renters, his sister (Miss Duncan) and Mrs Ellison, but Mrs Ellison, the last survivor, died on 25th May 1876. She was survived by eight children, two of whom had at that date attained majority, but none had attained the age of twenty-five years.

The total funds in the trustees' hands for the behoof of these children consisted of (1) the £5000 bequeathed to them; (2) one-third (or about £16,000) of the shares of residue set apart for the life rent use of the testator's brother (who predeceased him), and his niece, Miss M'Callum; and (3) one-fifth (or about £24,000) of residue.

A special case was presented to the Court, to which the trustees were first parties, Mr Ellison on behalf of his children and the children themselves were second parties, and the sole surviving next of kin of Mr Duncan were the third parties. The case, after setting forth the facts and passages of the deed above referred to, proceeded as follows:—"It is admitted that, from the circumstances of the children (of Mrs Ellison) the application of the whole or the greater portion of the income on their respective shares is urgently required for their maintenance and education, and the trustees have power to make such application. It is also admitted that the truster in the end of 1872 intimated to Mr John Ellison an intention of giving to his wife, the said Mrs Maria Lyall or Ellison, for herself and family, £100 every six months, and that the truster thereafter during his lifetime regularly made payments to Mrs Ellison in accordance with an intimated intention. It is submitted by the first parties (the trustees) that there is no power in the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr Duncan (at least no express power) sanctioning the advancement of any portion of the income for either of the above purposes, and that the children have at present no vested interest in their said provisions, or any of them." "It is submitted by the second parties, with reference to each of the provisions (1) that the children collectively have such an interest in their said provisions as entitles the trustees to apply the income thereof, or so much as may be necessary for the purposes of their maintenance and education; and (2) that the second parties have a vested interest in all the three recited provisions, or one or more of them."

The questions were,—(1) Have the second parties a vested interest in the provisions contained in the said recited clauses of the settlement, or in any and which of them? (2) Are the second parties entitled to have the income of any of said provisions paid over to them or applied for their behoof before they become entitled to payment of the shares of the capital, and, if so, to which of the provisions does this apply? (3) If the second parties are so entitled, are the trustees bound to pay over or apply, in the manner stated, the whole income; or, if not, how much? (4) If they are not so entitled, how does the income, or the appropriated portion thereof, fall to be applied?"

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The provisions must be held to be to have vested in the children.¹ (2) If the provisions had not vested in the children as individuals they must be held to have vested in them as a class, subject to the contingency of survivorship, and in that case they were entitled to get the accruing income for their maintenance and education.²

No. 170.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The material questions which arise for decision in this special case are contained in the first two heads of those put to us. The first is, whether the second parties, the children of Mrs Ellison, have a vested interest in the provisions contained in the clauses of this settlement, and, if in any, in which of them; and the second is whether, if they have not yet a vested interest in those provisions, they are entitled to have the income of them paid over to them or applied for their behoof, until the period of vesting arrives. These two questions depend upon the terms of a clause bequeathing a sum of £5000 to the children of Mrs Ellison, and on the residuary clause. The last of these must be construed in the first instance, for reasons which appear plainly from its words. The ninth purpose of the trust-deed, which contains the residuary bequest, is in the following terms:—(Reads.) As here expressed this clause gives rise to considerable perplexity, arising mainly from the conveyancer using a complicated plan to express a very simple destination. The clause in its substance, although not in its words, amounts simply to this: The testator divides the residue substantially into three parts, among three classes of liferenters and fiars. The first of these are Mary Duncan and Maria Lyall or Ellison, and the children of Mrs Ellison. These last are the second parties in the case. The second family is Margaret Ann M'Callum or Johnston and her children; and the third, Hilarion Duncan and his widow and children, "for their respective rights" (as the deed bears) "of liferent and fee." In other words, Mary Duncan and Maria Lyall or Ellison are to have the liferent of one-third of the residue, and Mrs Ellison's children are to have the fee of that third. But this bequest of residue is burdened by a liferent of two-fifths of the whole residue provided in favour of Colin Duncan and Janet Duncan M'Callum in the proportion of one-fifth to each. These last-mentioned liferenters are dead, and Mary Duncan and Maria Lyall or Ellison are likewise dead, and therefore the fee of one-third of the whole residue has now opened to the children of Maria Ellison, and the question we have to decide is whether it has vested or not.

Now, looking at the residuary bequest in the light of this explanation, it does not appear to me that there is any difficulty in deciding that question, for the deed expressly bears that all the shares of the ultimate residue are left "in the same way and manner in all respects, excepting only as aftermentioned, as is hereinbefore provided with reference to the three several legacies of £5000 hereinbefore conceived in favour of the said persons." Therefore, the question is to when these shares of the residue are to vest depends upon the conditions

¹ Alves' Trustees v. Grant, June 31, 1874, ante, vol. i. 969; Mathew v. Scott, Feb. 21, 1844, 6 D. 718; Maitland's Trustees v. M'Dermid, March 15, 1871, 23 D. 732, 33 Scot. Jur. 372.

² Boddy v. Dawes, Dec. 20, 1836, 1 Keen, 362; Chaworth v. Hooper, 1780, Brown's Chan. Cases, 82; Williams on Executors, vol. ii. 1430; 2 White and Tudor's Leading Cases (4th ed.), 312, note to Ashburner v. M'Guire; Hardman v. Guthrie, June 6, 1828, 6 Sh. 920; Templer v. Templer, April 1, 1828, 3 W. and S. 47; Campbell v. Reed, June 12, 1840, 2 D. 1084, 12 Scot. Jur. 515; Ralston v. Ralston, July 8, 1842, 4 D. 1496, 14 Scot. Jur. 573; McIlvie v. Cumming, Jan. 27, 1852, 14 D. 363, 24 Scot. Jur. 180, July 7, 1856, 19 D. (H. L.) 7, 28 Scot. Jur. 646.

No. 170.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

under which those legacies were left. Before turning to them I may remark that the only difficulty which has arisen in the case is founded on the fact that the testator divided in point of form his residue into five shares, although, in truth, he had only three classes of fiars among whom he intended it should be divided, the division into five shares being only applicable to the liferent rights. But he deals, first, with the two-fifths of the residue which was to be liferented by Colin Duncan and Janet Duncan M'Callum, and after providing that when these liferents fail the fee of the shares should fall to the same persons and in the same proportions as the rest of the residue, he has this clause:—"Subject always to the provision as to vesting hereinafter written as is hereinafter appointed with reference to the three remaining shares of said residue and remainder; but notwithstanding of what is before written, I provide and declare that none of the proportions of the said two shares or any part thereof shall become vested interests in the persons who may be entitled thereto until the same shall be paid over to them respectively."

In the view which I take of the case, as has been seen, the whole of these provisions were entirely superfluous, seeing that the fee of the two shares, the income of which was to be drawn by the liferenters, was simply to fall into the residue and to be divided accordingly. The regulating clause in regard to the conditions on which this was to take place is found in the general provision towards the end of the residuary clause. I am therefore quite unable to give effect to the contention that the words about vesting which I have just read create, as regards the fee of those two liferented shares, any distinction whatever between them and the other shares of residue which have been left to those persons. It follows that the provisions and conditions applicable to the legacy of £5000 are those which must regulate the succession to all the residue.

Now, when we turn to the clause under which those bequests were left I find no room for doubt so far as this matter of vesting is concerned. This legacy of £5000 to the daughters of Mrs Ellison is in the following terms:—"My trustees shall hold the fee of the said sum of £5000 for behoof of such of the children of the said Maria Lyall or Ellison, whether by her present or any future marriage, as shall be then surviving, and shall have attained or shall afterward attain the age of twenty-five years complete, and for behoof of the issue of any child or children who may have predeceased the cessation of the said liferent, or, if there be no liferenter, who may have predeceased the said last mentioned term, or who may die before attaining the foresaid age, leaving issue." These are the directions under which the residue is to vest, and is to be paid over, and I am very clearly of opinion that no vesting can take place under these provisions in any of the children until they attain the age of twenty-five years. As the clause is expressed this is a condition, and there is, in my opinion, no ground for holding that this is merely a postponement, as regards the individual children, of the period of payment. I think, therefore, the first question must be answered in the negative.

The second question is one of very considerable difficulty. The fee being entirely cleared of the liferent rights, what is to become of the accruing income prior to the period of vesting? I have come to be of opinion that we are entitled to direct that the accruing income of this provision should be applied for the benefit of the presumptive fiars. In the first place, although, as I have said, the clause under which the legacy of £5000 is left postpones vesting until a child arrived at the age of twenty-five, I am of opinion that the whole sum, both of legacy and of residue, vested in the children as a class. There is no alter-destination. The whole interest, whatever it is, vests in the children themselves, No. 170. although the individual shares have not vested. The case of Maitland (23 Dunlop, 732) is a strong authority to that effect. In that case it was held, in July 17, 1877. regard to a clause expressed in a way very similar to the present, that although Duncan's Trustees and Others. the children predeceased the period at which the vesting was to take place, if one of them survived all vested in him, although he might not have arrived at the age at which individual vesting was to take place. This decision proceeded on the principle that as no other interests whatever were involved, and it was quite certain that no one could claim to share with the surviving child, the whole necessarily vested in him. It seems to me that this rule embodies a principle of good sense as well as of law,—that if a fund is devoted for the benefit of the family as a class, and not destined to any one failing those legatees, it is reasonable that the money should be applied for the benefit of the survivor, seeing that the only object of the provisions postponing vesting have no longer any application.

There are not many cases in our books on this subject, but it seems to be settled in the law of England that where a fund like this is in the hands of trustees for the behoof of a family, although payment and vesting may be postponed, it is within the power of the Court to direct the trustees to apply the accruing income for the benefit, maintenance, and education of the children. It is true that this rule seems to be confined to cases in which the testator stands in loco parentis, and in which it might be presumed from his relationship to the persons favoured by the will that such was and must have been his intention. This element is not absent here. I find it stated in the case that it is admitted that from the circumstances of the children the application of the whole or greater part of the income of their respective shares is urgently required for their maintenance and education. It is also admitted that the truster in the end of 1872 intimated to Mr John Ellison an intention of giving to his wife, the said Mrs Maria Lyall or Ellison, for herself and family, £100 every six months, and that the truster thereafter during his lifetime regularly made payments to Mrs Ellison in accordance with the said intimated intention. That being the state of the family and the position in which the testator stood, the case seems to me to come completely within the rule which I find laid down in Williams on Executors. I need not go over the cases. They are quoted in that work, and were commented on from the bar. In the circumstances in which this family stands, I am of opinion that the accruing income of the property which is ultimately to vest in one or more of them is not more than sufficient to maintain and educate those who require it.

While, therefore, I propose to answer the first question in the negative, I think the second should be answered in the affirmative, and in that case the third and fourth will not require to be answered.

LORD ORMDALE.—This special case raises some questions of nicety and difficulty. They resolve substantially into two—1st, Are the provisions intended for the second parties to be held as vested in them, notwithstanding that they have not attained the age of twenty-five? and 2dly, Are the second parties not at least entitled in the meantime to the income or interest of these provisions, or to have it applied for their behoof?

In regard to the provision of £5000, referred to in the third branch of the seventh purpose of the testator's settlement, it seems to me to be too clear for doubt that it has not vested, and cannot vest in the second parties, till, in the

No. 170.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

words of the testator, they "shall attain the age of twenty-five years complete," which none of them have yet done. Not only is this expressly declared, but there is a survivorship, and also ulterior interests, attached to the destination of the provision, which would require to be disregarded in order to its being held as now vested.

The other provisions, consisting of one-third of the two shares of residue referred to in the ninth purpose of the deed of settlement, although dealt with by the testator in peculiar terms, must, I think, be held to stand in the same position as the £5000 provision already noticed. The argument founded upon the phraseology employed by the testator in regard to the provisions now in question raises too slight an implication, if any at all, to entitle the Court to distinguish them, as regards the matter of vesting, from the other provision of £5000.

And so, also, I am unable to hold it implied that the testator meant and intended any of the provisions to vest in the beneficiaries before they attained the age of twenty-five years, merely because there is to be found in his deed of settlement an appointment of tutors and curators to all persons taking benefit under it "who may be in pupillarity or minority, quoad such benefit, during their respective pupillarities and minorities." I am not satisfied there might not have been persons beneficiaries under his settlement other than the second parties to the present case to whom the appointment of tutors and curators might not have been applicable when the deed of settlement was executed. For example, there are several persons referred to in the fourth purpose of the deed, legatees to the extent of £250, some of whom may have been in pupillarity or minority when the deed was executed in 1867. There are also legacies bequeathed by the testator in his codicil to children expressly, and it may very well be that the general clause as to the appointment of tutors and curators was inserted in his settlement in order to meet the case of pupil or minor legatees whom he might favour in any codicil he might afterwards execute.

In regard to the second question, relating to the interest or income of the residue, I have more difficulty. In the general case, interest or income cannot well be held to be payable to any party in whom the capital has not yet vested, unless there be a direction, express or implied, to that effect. But in the present case, although there is no express direction, yet, when I keep in view the rule which appears, from the cases which were cited at the debate, and as explained by your Lordship, to operate in the Equity Courts in England, to the effect that parties, and more especially children as a class, as here, having merely prospective contingent interests in a capital sum, may be entitled to the interest of it,—a principle which seems to have been given effect to in this Court in the case of Campbell v. Reed, 12th June 1840, 2 D. 1084,—I am not disposed to dissent from what I understand is the opinion of both your Lordships, that the interest or income in question, which is not directed to be otherwise accumulated, may be paid to or applied to the benefit of the second parties.

LORD GIFFORD.—The will of the late James Duncan, on the construction of which depend the questions raised under the special case, is a somewhat complicated instrument, and I have found some of the questions to which it gives rise attended with considerable nicety and difficulty.

The first question relates to the period of vesting of the provisions which the testator makes for the children of Mrs Maria Lyall or Ellison. These provisions are three in number—1st, A sum of £5000, which the testator directs to be set aside, held, and applied in the third sub-section of the seventh purpose of his deed; 2d, One-third of two-fifth shares of the residue of the estate, which two-fifth shares were to be liferented by Colin Duncan and Janet Duncan M'Callum, No. 170. as provided in the ninth purpose of the trust-deed; and, 3d, One-fifth share of the residue of the estate, also provided in the ninth purpose of the deed.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

I am of opinion, on a construction of the terms of the whole deed, that none of these provisions have yet become vested interests in any of the children of the late Mrs Maria Lyall or Ellison, who are the second parties to this special case. I think that no vesting can take place under Mr Duncan's deed until the children of Mrs Ellison respectively attain the age of twenty-five years. The main clause in the trust-deed, so far as the question of vesting is concerned, is the third sub-section of the seventh purpose of the deed, for although this clause only refers to the first provision—the legacy of £5000—it really governs all the other provisions in favour of the Ellison family, and the testator expressly refers back to it in constituting the subsequent provisions.

Now, in reference to the fee of this £5000, the interest of which was to be paid to Mary Duncan and to Mrs Ellison in succession, the testator provides that, after the death of Mary Duncan and Mrs Ellison, “my trustees shall hold the fee of the said sum of £5000 for behoof of such of the children of the said Maria Lyall or Ellison, whether by her present or any future marriage, as shall be then surviving, and shall have attained, or shall afterwards attain, the age of twenty-five years complete,” and then there is a destination to the issue of such children as may die before attaining that age. It appears to me that the attainment of twenty-five years is a proper condition, essential to any of Mrs Ellison's children, as individuals, taking a vested interest in the provision. The condition is imposed in the strongest way, namely, by way of limiting the class who are to take. The bequest is not to all Mrs Ellison's children, with a mere postponement of payment,—it is a bequest only to “such of the children” as may attain twenty-five, so that if any child predeceases that age he or she is not an ultimate beneficiary or legatee at all. I think this is conclusive against the vesting in any child until the age of twenty-five.

Nor is the case different with regard to the other two provisions, which consist of shares of the general residue of the trust-estate. These shares of residue are given to Mary Duncan and Mrs Ellison, and to the children of Mrs Ellison “for their respective rights of liferent and fee”—“all in the same way and manner in all respects (excepting only as aftermentioned) as is hereinbefore provided with reference to the three several legacies of £5000 hereinbefore conceived in favour of the said persons.” The exception here mentioned only relates to the estimated interest which is to be added to the legacy of £5000, and which estimated interest, at four per cent, is not to apply to residue, which will only receive the actual interest which may accrue thereon. The result appears to be, in so far as relates to the fee of the residuary bequests, that the same will not rest in any of Mrs Ellison's children individually until such children respectively attain the age of twenty-five years complete. The same rule is applicable to the residue as to the legacy of £5000. Both are only to belong to “such of the children” as attain that age. I am of opinion, therefore, that the first question put in the special case should be answered in the negative. No vesting of any of the provisions has yet taken place.

The remaining questions in the special case are attended with still greater difficulty, and it is not without considerable hesitation that I have come to think that although no part of the capital or fee of the provisions has yet vested in any of Mrs Ellison's children, the interest now accruing on these provisions is

No. 170. available for the necessary maintenance and education of the whole of Mrs Ellison's family.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

The general rule is, that where a money legacy is only due and payable upon the occurrence of an uncertain event, that is, upon the purifying of a proper or uncertain condition, no interest is due until the condition is purified and the legacy becomes payable. Interest is not due upon legacies, any more than upon debts, until they fall due and become payable. This rule is necessarily subject to an exception when the legacy consists of a general residue, or of a share thereof, for in such cases the intermediate interest must necessarily go along with and accrue to the legacy itself. Accruing interest on residue is really just a part of that residue when it is not otherwise disposed of. It is a different question whether in the case of a conditional or contingent bequest of residue the accruing interest can be paid before the term of vesting of the residue itself, or whether it must not accumulate for behoof of the legatees who may ultimately take the residue.

Still it is always an important element that in bequests of residue the accruing interest does not go to any third party, but necessarily belongs to the residuary legatees, whether it be paid ad interim or whether it accumulate till the final payment of the residue itself. In the present case, although the first provision is not residue, but a money legacy of £5000, I think the rule will apply that the interest thereon must be dealt with as interest upon residue, for the same parties who are entitled thereto are entitled to the corresponding shares of residue, so that their provision is really a provision of residue, increased by £5000, the other residuary legatees having a like share of residue increased by a like increment. I think, therefore, I may deal with the question of interest as if it were all interest accruing on shares of residue.

Now, in the first place, when a residue or share of residue is to be liferented by a parent and the fee thereof is destined to her children, and where there is no provision for accumulation of interest, I think there is a strong presumption that the testator did not intend the payment of the annual interest on the residue to stop at the mother's death, however young and unprovided for her children might then be, although the fee of the residue might only be given to such of the children as might attain majority or be married. Accumulation is not to be presumed where not specially directed, and it would be a very hard and somewhat inequitable result if Mrs Ellison's young family should by their mother's death be deprived of the income or interest which their mother enjoyed, and should be obliged to do without that interest in the meantime, and without the means of support to wait for that interest accumulating for them till they respectively attain the age of twenty-five. Wherever interest of residue is payable to a parent in liferent, and the ultimate fee destined to the children, but payment thereof postponed, it will be very easy to presume that the testator intended the pupil or minor children to get the same benefit of annual proceeds as their father or mother had enjoyed. Accordingly it seems to be quite settled by the authorities that where a parent himself provides to his children shares of residue or even simple legacies, the payment or vesting of which is postponed till majority or marriage or other contingent event, the children will nevertheless be entitled to the intermediate accruing interest for the purposes of maintenance. But this principle has been extended beyond the case of children to cases where the testator held or assumed the position of being in loco parentis to the children to whom he destined the fee of the provision. This rule has been established by the following, among other, cases,—Acherley v. Vernon, 1 P. Williams, 783; Beckford v. Tobin, 1 Vesey senr. 307; Hill v. Hill, 3 Vesey and Beam, 183; Campbell v. Reid, 2 D. 1084; Ogilvie v. Cumming, Jan. 27, 1852, 14 D. 363; Maitland's Trustees v. M'Dermid, 23 D. 732; Hardman v. Guthrie, June 1, 1828, 6 S. 920; Templer v. Templer, April 1, 1828, 3 W. and S. 47.

No. 170.

July 17, 1877.
Duncan's
Trustees
and Others.

In the present special case it is expressly admitted that the truster placed himself in loco parentis to Mrs Ellison's children, and that for at least two years before his death he promised to pay and did actually pay to Mrs Ellison for behoof of herself and "family" the sum of £100 every six months. The precise relationship between the testator and Mrs Ellison's family is not stated in the case, but I understand it was very close, although perhaps not bearing a legal character.

In the whole circumstances, though not without hesitation, I am of opinion that Mrs Ellison's children are entitled to the interest of their provisions, and that before the capital thereof vests in them by their attaining respectively the age of twenty-five, and although the accruing interest is of considerable amount, I think that the trustees are entitled to pay the whole in equal proportions to or for behoof of the eight children of Mrs Ellison. It is stated in the case that the whole or nearly the whole income is urgently required for the maintenance and education of the children, and the trustees should see that it is applied for the children's benefit. The second and third questions, therefore, should be answered to this effect, and the fourth question is superseded.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is an omission in the case that the relationship between the parties was not made quite specific. However, though that is so, we have not proceeded on any unfounded ground in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor, finding—"1. That the second parties have not a vested interest in the provisions contained in the recited clauses of the settlement of James Duncan: 2. That the second parties are entitled to have the income of all of said provisions paid over to them, or applied for their behoof, before they become entitled to payment of their share of the capital: 3. Find it unnecessary to answer the two last queries: Find the expenses of both parties payable out of the capital of said provisions, and decern."

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—JOHN CARMENT, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS ANDERSON (Thomson's Factor), Pursuer and Real Raiser.

ROBERT THOMSON AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Kinnear—Jameson.

THOMAS GLASS AND OTHERS, Claimants.—M'Laren—Asher.

WILLIAM SPENCER AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Trayner—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 171.

July 17, 1877.
Anderson v.
Thomson, &c.

Succession—Special Legacy—Ademption—Deposit-receipt.—A lady, on 23d March 1875, left a sealed packet with her law-agent marked, "to be opened only in the event of my death," containing a letter dated the same day addressed to the law-agent with, inter alia, the following testamentary direction—"I empower you to uplift the deposit-receipt lying with you for £4000, to lodge it in your own name, and to hold it in trust for my mother's brothers and sister and for their children." She at the same time verbally instructed her law-agent to transfer the £4000 on deposit-receipt to his own name, promising to send written instructions as to its disposal, which were not sent. The law-agent, at the same time, said that he had made advances for her of £200 and would keep that sum out of the £4000, to which she agreed, and the balance was put in deposit-receipt in his name "in trust." On 12th May 1875 the law-agent suggested to her the investment of this sum upon a heritable security, for the purpose of obtaining

No. 171. higher interest. She agreed to £3500 being so invested, and this was done. The testatrix died on 8th June 1876. Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the legacy was special, and had been adeemed.

July 17, 1877.
Anderson v.
Thomson, &c.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk) on the doctrine that ademption does not depend upon intention.

Succession—Fee and Liferent—Residue.—A testator, in a testamentary letter of instructions, after bequeathing certain legacies, directed her law-agent “to hold the residue of my estate and distribute it annually between the following gentlemen.” Held that this was a bequest of the fee of the residue to the persons named.

2d Division.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
R.

THIS action of multiplepoinding was raised by Mr Thomas Anderson, writer, Glasgow, judicial factor on the estate of the late Miss Jane Thomson, who died in Glasgow on 8th June 1876 possessed of heritable and moveable property to the extent of upwards of £19,000, for the distribution of the estate. On 23d March 1875 Miss Thomson, preparatory to leaving home to travel for some time upon the Continent, had left with Mr Anderson (who acted as her law-agent) a packet enclosed in a sealed envelope addressed to him, and endorsed “to be opened only in the event of my death.—J. T.” He had retained this packet until Miss Thomson’s death and then opened it, when it was found to contain a testamentary writing, holograph of Miss Thomson, in the following terms:—“9 Jane Street, Glasgow, 23d March 1875. Mr Anderson,—Dear Sir—As I purpose going from home, I think it right to leave written instructions with you in the event of my death, and request you to carry out the following instructions and arrangements. I empower you to uplift the deposit-receipt lying with you for £4000, to lodge it in your own name, and to hold it in trust for my mother’s brothers and sister, and for their children; further to make payment to Miss Annie Glass, Montreal”—(then followed various legacies.)—“and to hold the residue of my estate and distribute it annually between the following gentlemen—Mr William Spencer, Mr Bromhead, and Mr James Lindsay, along with the following presents to them: To Mr Lindsay my dining furniture.” &c. “I hope I have made everything explicit, and mean this to remain as my settlement of my affairs, and to be acted upon and carried out by you in the event of my death, and reserve to myself the power to alter or revoke these arrangements during my lifetime.—I am, dear sir, yours very sincerely, Jane Thomson, 9 Jane Street, Glasgow, 23d March 1875.”

A few days after Miss Thomson’s death her former law-agents intimated to Mr Anderson that they had in their possession a general disposition and settlement by Miss Thomson, dated 18th February 1861, whereby she conveyed her whole estate to her mother, Mrs Catherine Glass or Thomson, who predeceased her, and her heirs and assignees. Miss Thomson had no brothers or sisters, and her next of kin on her father’s side were her uncle and aunt, Robert Thomson and Mrs Margaret Thomson or Campbell. She had, however, a large number of relations on her mother’s side, consisting of the families of her mother’s four brothers of the name of Glass, and other collateral relatives.

Robert Thomson and his sister lodged a claim in the process in which they claimed express provisions made to them in the testamentary letter; and, in addition, the fee of the residue of the estate after the expiry of what they alleged to be the liferents of Messrs Spencer, Bromhead, and Lindsay.

The Glass family claimed the £4000 referred to in the letter, and shares of the residue after the expiry of the liferents, in virtue of the conveyance in the disposition of 1861.

Messrs Spencer, Bromhead, and Lindsay claimed their special bequests, and also the residue of the whole estate, including the sum of £4000 provided to the Glass family, which they contended had been adeemed.

A proof having been allowed in the competition, Mr Anderson was examined with regard to the actings of the testator upon which the plea of ademption of the £4000 was founded. The important parts of his evidence were as follows:—"I am a member of the firm of M'Gregor, Donald, and Company, writers, Glasgow. I was agent for the late Miss Jane Thomson. I managed her money matters for her. She called at my office on 23d March 1875. At that time she had £4000 lying on deposit-receipt in the City of Glasgow Bank, being the balance uninvested of the proceeds of a property in Argyle Street which I sold for her. . . . I produce the deposit-receipt, which is dated 5th March 1875. At the time she called she was on the eve of going to the Continent with some friends for a trip, and she asked me to transfer the money lying on deposit-receipt into my own name in the meantime. From an entry made in my books at the time I see that she 'promised to send me instructions as to the application of the same.' She gave me no reason for desiring that I should transfer the deposit to my own name, and I did not ask her for any. She gave me no written instructions that day, but promised to send me written instructions. She endorsed the receipt. I did not receive any written instructions from her while she was on the Continent. I had advanced £182 to pay an account of M'Tear the auctioneer, and £20 or £30 in the settling of the price of the ground-annuals, and when she instructed me to transfer the deposit I said I had advanced the £182, and that I would keep £200 out of the amount of the deposit. She agreed to that at once. In consequence of these instructions I directed my clerk to cash the deposit-receipt, to retain £200, and redeposit the balance and interest on the balance, amounting to £3804, 18s. 6d., in my name in trust, 'in trust' being added to shew that it was not my own money. . . . I had a meeting with Miss Thomson on the 12th of May, which must have been shortly after her return from her Continental trip. The following is the account of that meeting entered in my books:—"Meeting you to-day (12th May), when you requested us to remit your uncle, Mr Robert Thomson, £100 per annum, half-yearly, and receiving written instructions to that effect; advising as to investment of money in bank, handing you valuation and rental of property, Paisley Road, over which £4500 wanted, when you agreed to give £3500, to rank equally with another for £1000.' That referred to the investment of the sum which stood in my name in trust. (Q.) Do you remember whether Miss Thomson asked you to invest the money, or you proposed it? (A.) She called, and I proposed it. I did not write to her about that. (Q.) What was her object in calling? (A.) It was coming on to term time, and I suppose she called to ask about her property. (Q.) Had she called to give you directions about remitting the £100 per annum? (A.) Her object was to get £10 on account of interest due at Whitsunday, and she gave instructions to remit £50 every six months until further notice. The written instructions are below the receipt for the £10, which I now produce. The proposal to invest the money originated entirely with myself, and she agreed at once. She was to get 4½ per cent. of interest, which was a good deal more than was allowed by the bank. I can't say exactly what the bank rate then was. There were no other uninvested funds belonging to Miss Thomson, so far as I am aware, out of which this loan could have been made. After receiving her instructions I cashed the deposit-receipt, and made the advance she agreed to on heritable security. The transaction was really a Whitsunday transaction, but was actually carried through a few days later—on the 31st of May. The money continued to stand out on heritable security until Miss Thomson's death. It is given up in the inventory."

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th February 1877, pronounced this interlo-

No. 171.

July 17, 1877.
Anderson v.
Thomson, &c.

No. 171. cutor:—"Finds that the legacy of £4000 contained in the deposit-receipt mentioned in the testator's will has been adeemed: . . . Finds that the residue of the estate is divisible in equal shares between and among the claimants William Spencer, Horatio Kelson Bromhead, and James Lindsay; . . . and appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure." *

July 17, 1877.
Anderson v.
Thomson, &c.

Thomas Glass and others reclaimed, and argued;—(1) As to the £4000. It was a legacy of so much money, and not a specific legacy of the money contained in the deposit-receipt. The receipt was only referred to for convenience.¹ The true doctrine with regard to the ademption of legacies laid down in the civil law² was that there must be an intention to revoke on the part of the testator. The form in which the security had been taken had nothing to do with the payment of the legacy, which was an ordinary pecuniary one.³ (2) As to residue. The terms of the letter shewed that there was only a bequest of the liferent of the residue to the three persons named, and the fee fell to be disposed of according to the destination in the deed of 1861, which had never been revoked.

Argued for the Thomsons;—The predecease of the testator's mother evacuated the conveyance in the deed of 1861.⁴ The bequest of the annual income of the residue being only one of liferent, the fee of the residue went to the heirs ab intestato. A gift of interest did not carry the principal, even though it was not otherwise disposed of.⁵

Argued for Spencer and others;—(1) As to the £4000. This was a specific legacy,⁶ and it had been adeemed.⁷ It was fixed law that the intention of the testator was not to be considered in a question of ademption.⁸ (2) As to the residue. The intention of the testator was clear. The bequest was one of the fee of the residue.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has felt much difficulty in this case, and he has pronounced the preceding interlocutor with great hesitation.

"(1st), He has come to be of opinion that the bequest, relating to the deposit-receipt is specific, and that it has been adeemed in consequence of the contents of the receipt having been uplifted and otherwise invested during the testator's lifetime. The form in which the bequest is made, and the manner in which alone it can be made effectual, seems to him to lead to this result.

"(3d), He is of opinion that the testator meant to dispose of her whole estate. She says that the letter was intended to be a 'settlement of my affairs,' and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary it must be read, if possible, in such a way as to exclude intestacy. No construction can be put on the clause disposing of the residue which does not do violence to the words. But the Lord Ordinary has endeavoured to construe it as far as possible in conformity with what he considers to be the testator's intention."

¹ Lambert v. Lambert, Jan. 16, 1806, 11 Vesey, 607; Clark v. Browne, July 25, 1854, 2 Smale and Giffard, 524.

² Just. Inst. ii., 20, 12.

³ Pagan v. Pagan, Jan. 26, 1838, 16 Sh. 383, 10 Scot. Jur. 236; Chalmers v. Chalmers, Nov. 19, 1851, 14 D. 57; Congreve's Trustees v. Congreve, June 27, 1874, ante, vol. i. 1102.

⁴ Findlay v. Mackenzie, July 9, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 909.

⁵ Sanderson's Executor v. Kerr and Others, Dec. 21, 1860, 23 D. 227, 35 Scot. Jur. 114; Humphreys v. Humphreys, July 24, 1789, 2 Cox, 184.

⁶ Williams on Executors, vol. ii. 1160; 2 White and Tudor's L. C. 277.

⁷ Jack v. Lauder, 1742, M. 11,357; Pagan v. Pagan, and Chalmers v. Chalmers, supra, note 3; Gardner v. Hatton, April 2, 1833, 6 Simon, 93.

⁸ Roper on Legacies, i. 333, 202, 338; Lord Thurlow in Stanley v. Potter, July 16, 1829, 2 Cox, 180; 2 White and Tudor's L. C. 291.

At advising,—

No. 171.

LORD ORMDALE.—The first question which was discussed by the parties at the debate in this case is, whether the bequest of £4000 is a specific one, and if it is so to be held, whether it was adeemed by the testatrix? The Lord Ordinary, while he has answered this question in the affirmative, says that he has done so with great hesitation.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary.

The question resolves into two branches—(1) Is the legacy a specific one? and (2) has it been adeemed?

In reference to the character of the legacy, it must be borne in mind that a particular sum of money, as distinguished from others, may constitute a specific legacy. Thus, the bequest of £1000 lent on bond to two persons named, as in Pagan v. Pagan, January 26, 1838, 16 Sh. 383, or of a sum of money in a particular bag, as in Lawson v. Stitch, 1 Atk. 508, are specific legacies, while a bequest of a sum of money generally out of the testator's estate is not so. And where a certain sum is given, and the fund in which it is invested is described or pointed at merely, the legacy will be demonstrative, as illustrated by the cases referred to in the 2d vol. of White and Tudor's Leading Cases, 2d ed. p. 241.

Having regard to these distinctions, it appears to me that the legacy in question is a specific one; for it is not merely a sum of £4000 generally, but the £4000 "lying with you," that is, Mr Anderson, to whom the testamentary letter is addressed by the testatrix. The bequest is in this way identified as a particular sum, separated and apart from the testator's estate generally. Nor do I think that it destroys this characteristic of the legacy that the testatrix goes on to instruct Mr Anderson to uplift the £4000, and re-deposit it on a receipt in his own name, and "to hold it in trust for my mother's brothers and sister and their children." I rather think that, in place of doing so, the identity of the sum, as separated and laid apart from the testatrix's general estate, is made all the more marked.

Assuming, then, that the legacy must be regarded as a specific one, the question next arises—Has it been adeemed?

About the facts on which this depends there is no dispute. Mr Anderson states them distinctly. His statement amounts to this—that the testatrix had anticipated, so to speak, the direction in her testamentary letter, and at a personal call before she left for the Continent indorsed the deposit-receipt for the £4000, and directed him to re-deposit the money in his own name "in the meantime;" that he did so under deduction of £200, which he retained, as he told her at the time he would do, to pay some outstanding debts of the testatrix; and that on the following day the testamentary writing was sent him by the testatrix enclosed in an envelope, which he did not open till after her death.

But in the interval between the time when the testatrix returned from the Continent and her death important acts in connection with the £4000 occurred, which are founded upon as shewing that she had adeemed the legacy. These acts are referred to by Mr Anderson as follows:—"I had a meeting with Miss Thomson on the 12th of May, which must have been shortly after her return from her Continental trip. The following is the account of that meeting entered in my books—'Meeting you to-day (12th May)

No. 171. when you requested us to remit your uncle, Mr Robert Thomson, £100 per annum half-yearly, and receiving written instructions to that effect; advising as to investment of money in bank; handing you rental and valuation of property July 17, 1877. as to investment of money in bank; handing you rental and valuation of property Anderson v. Thomson, &c. Paisley Road, over which £4500 wanted, when you agreed to give £3500 to rank equally with another for £1000.' That referred to the investment of the sum which stood in my name in trust. (Q.) Do you remember whether Miss Thomson asked you to invest the money or you proposed it? (A.) She called, and I proposed it. I did not write to her about that. (Q.) What was her object in calling? (A.) It was coming on to term time, and I suppose she called to ask about her property. (Q.) Had she called to give you directions about remitting the £100 per annum? (A.) Her object was to get £10 on account of interest due at Whitsunday, and she gave instructions to remit £50 every six months until further notice. The written instructions are below the receipt for the £10, which I now produce. The proposal to invest the money originated entirely with myself, and she agreed at once. She was to get $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of interest, which was a good deal more than was allowed by the bank. I can't say exactly what the bank rate then was. There were no other uninvested funds belonging to Miss Thomson, so far as I am aware, out of which this loan could have been made. After receiving her instructions I cashed the deposit-receipt, and made the advance she agreed to on heritable security. The transaction was really: Whitsunday one, but was actually carried through a few days later, on the 31st of May. The money continued to stand out on heritable security until Miss Thomson's death. It is given up in the inventory."

Now, it will be observed from this statement that the identity and character of the £4000, as shewn in the testamentary writing are entirely changed. It is no longer a sum deposited in bank on a receipt either in the name of the testatrix or of Mr Anderson, and the sum itself has been considerably reduced. £3500 of it has been laid out on heritable security, and the remainder otherwise disposed of. And all this was done by Mr Anderson during the testatrix's life, and in obedience to her instructions, and of course in her knowledge.

With reference to these circumstances, and having regard to the decided case on the question of ademption, I do not see how the conclusion can be resisted that the bequest in dispute has been adeemed by the testatrix. It seems to be firmly established in England, ever since the judgment of Lord Thurlow in the cases of Ashburner v. M'Guire (2 Br. C. Cases, 108), and Stanley v. Potter (1 Br. C. Cases, 180), that the test of ademption is whether the specific thing bequeathed by a testator continued to exist at his death, or had been converted into something else, and this independently altogether of the animus adimendi, a consideration which has been discarded on the ground that it was calculated to create confusion and uncertainty. Accordingly the principle of ademption appears to have been given effect to in England by numerous cases which are noticed in Whitton and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity (2d ed. vol. ii. 143, et seq.) And some of these cases approach very closely to the present; for example, in Green v. Symonds (1 Br. Ch. Cases, 129), where the testator bequeathed to C all his books at his chambers in the Temple, and afterwards removed them to the country, it was held that the removal effected an ademption; so in Gardner v. Hatton (6 Sim. 53) where a testator bequeathed a sum of £7000 secured on mortgage of an estate at W, belonging to R Y, and the £7000 with interest having been received after the date of the will by the testator's agent on his account, and immediately after £6000 of it was invested upon another mortgage, on which it remained at the testator's death, it was held to be adeemed. No. 171.

There are Scotch cases to the same effect. Thus, in the case of Jack v. Lauder, July 17, 1877. Anderson v. Thomson, &c. July 27, 1742, Mor. 11,357, it was held that a testator receiving payment of the contents of a bill which he had bequeathed to a legatee had revoked or adeemed a legacy. So in Pagan v. Pagan, already alluded to, a special legacy of £1000 lent on bond to E and J was held to be put an end to in consequence of the debtor having voluntarily paid up the bond two years before the testator's death. And in the case of Chalmers v. Chalmers and Others, November 19, 1851, 14 D. 57, where a testator by his trust-settlement directed one of four houses to be conveyed to each of his nephews, and thereafter one of the houses having been compulsorily taken by a railway company, and the testator having afterwards died without making any alteration in his settlement, or in any way setting aside the price of the house for his nephew, it was held that the nephew to whom the house had been destined had no claim for its value, the principle of the decision being that the specific thing bequeathed having ceased to exist before the death of the testator the legacy must be held to have been adeemed.

I think therefore the Lord Ordinary's judgment in regard to the £4000 legacy is right. It may operate considerable hardship on some of the parties, but not greater than in some of the cases to which I have referred, and at any rate such a consideration cannot be allowed to affect the decision of the Court.

The second and only other contested question which requires now to be decided relates to the residue clause, which is undoubtedly in some respects very awkwardly expressed. I cannot doubt, however, having regard to the Titles to Land Act, 1858, and the cases which have since followed upon it, that the clause is habile and sufficient to carry the residue. The disputed point was not so much that, as whether the persons named in the clause are to be held entitled to the fee or capital of the residue, or merely of the annual interest or income that may accrue from it. Now, when I see that the testatrix expressly directs that the residue of her estate shall be distributed among the persons named by her, although she adds "annually," I feel myself constrained to hold that the fee or capital is to be at once paid over to them, and that the word "annually" must be disregarded as having been used inadvertently by the testatrix, and at any rate without intending thereby to convert into a life interest an expression, by-the-bye, which she does not use—that which otherwise I think, as I have said, must be held to be a disposal once and for all of the entire residue. I feel strengthened in this conclusion by the consideration that the testatrix directs the residue to be distributed to the persons named by her "along" with certain articles of plate and furniture which were clearly to be given over to them at once, and not merely life-entailed by them.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is also right in regard to this matter, the result being that his interlocutor reclaimed against will fall to be adhered to, and the case remitted to him to proceed further as may be just.

LORD GIFFORD.—The questions raised under the holograph settlement or testamentary letter of the late Miss Jane Thomson, dated 23d March 1875, are attended with great difficulty, chiefly owing to the imperfect and doubtful manner in which Miss Thomson has expressed herself in that letter, and to the difficulty of gathering therefrom what was Miss Thomson's real purpose and intention in regard to the final distribution of her means and estate.

No. 171. For I am of opinion that the questions raised are in substance questions regarding the true intention and meaning of the testator, Miss Jane Thomson, and July 17, 1877. I think that if her true intention can be sufficiently and satisfactorily gathered Anderson v. Thomson, &c. from the terms of her testamentary letter then there is no legal obstacle to these intentions being duly and effectually carried out. It appears to me that the leading questions in the case do not depend upon technical rules or upon technical words; but if it can be made to appear what the testator intended to be done with her estate after her death then that intention falls to receive effect. Perhaps I should except from the generality of this statement the question of the ademption of the legacy, for there is high authority for saying that in questions of ademption of special legacies the rule depends, not on the intention of the testator, but on the form in which the estate is left at the testator's death.

Of course, the testamentary intention of Miss Thomson must be learned and gathered solely from her testamentary writings, and I think that in the present case the sole testamentary writing with which we have to do is Miss Thomson's letter addressed to Mr Anderson and dated 23d March 1875. This letter was placed in Mr Anderson's hands, or rather sent to Mr Anderson by Miss Thomson with a letter dated 24th March 1875, enclosing to him in a sealed packet only to be opened after her death, the testamentary letter dated 23d March being the previous day. This document remained under seal in Mr Anderson's custody until Miss Thomson's death, which happened about fifteen months afterwards, on 18th June 1876.

There was, no doubt, a previous disposition and settlement by Miss Thomson dated 18th February 1861, but as I read the testamentary letter of 23d March 1875 it supersedes all former settlements, and by itself constitutes a complete mortis causa settlement of Miss Thomson's whole estate. If I am right in this the disposition and settlement of 18th February 1861 is altogether suspended and inoperative, and in this view it need not be looked at. It is only in the event of its being held that the testamentary letter of 23d March 1875 does not dispose of Miss Thomson's whole property that there would be any occasion to fall back upon Miss Thomson's earlier testament.

I take, then, the letter of 23d March 1875, and I read it in order to see if it was intended to form a final and complete settlement mortis causa of the writer's whole estate. I think it does, and it effectually regulates her whole succession.

The letter begins by stating that Miss Thomson purposes going from home, and it gives Mr Anderson certain instructions "in the event of my death;" but although these expressions might suggest that the settlement was only interim and temporary, in case of accident to the writer during her foreign journey, all doubt on this point is completely removed by a sentence at the end of the letter where Miss Thomson says—"I hope I have made everything explicit: and I mean this to remain as my settlement of my affairs, and to be acted upon and carried out by you in the event of my death." It appears to me that this is equivalent to an express declaration by the testator that the writing is Miss Thomson's last will and settlement, which is "to be acted upon and carried out" by Mr Anderson as a settlement of her whole affairs. If, therefore, the writing does purport to direct the disposal of Miss Thomson's whole estate I think it must receive effect as a universal settlement.

It is true that the writing does not contain any dispositive words, or words of conveyance or assignation. It does not convey in terminis the whole estate to Mr Anderson as trustee or executor. It is conceived in a different manner.

is in the form of instructions to Mr Anderson, directing him what to do with the estate, and what arrangements he is to carry out after Miss Thomson's death. But if the instructions embrace the distribution of Miss Thomson's whole succession, it is not of the least consequence in what form the will is expressed. It must receive effect according to its true intent and meaning. Now, in reference to the claim of Mr Spencer, Mr Bromhead, and Mr Lindsay, I am of opinion that the letter contains an effectual bequest in their favour of the whole residue of Miss Thomson's estate. The words are—"And I empower you also" (and then after providing for two annuities the testatrix proceeds) "to hold the residue of my estate, and distribute it annually between the following gentlemen—Mr William Spencer, 160 Hope Street; Mr Bromhead, architect, 196 St Vincent Street; and Mr James Lindsay, Gualequay, Chu, Buenos Ayres, South America, along with the following presents to them." Of course, the only difficulty here is the occurrence of the word "annually." Without that word there could be no doubt that the whole residue is disposed of. The opposing claimants maintain that the word "annually" necessarily implies that it was the income or annual proceeds of the residue that was given, and that the capital or fee of the residue was not disposed of at all by the writing, but either falls under the previous settlement of 1861 or belongs as intestacy to Miss Thomson's next of kin or heirs-at-law. I cannot accept this contention. What is it that is to be distributed annually among the three gentlemen named? Not the income or the annual proceeds of the residue, but the residue itself—"the residue of my estate." These words are hardly susceptible of construction; and when to this is added that the letter is expressly declared "my settlement of my affairs"—that is, of my whole affairs—an entire settlement, not a partial one—I cannot interpolate words which would make the testatrix say annual proceeds of residue instead of what she does say, "residue of my estate"—and which would have the effect of destroying the writing as a universal settlement, and of converting it into a very partial settlement indeed. If it is necessary to give a meaning to the word "annually," I think it is sufficiently satisfied by remembering that there were considerable annuities which were provided for, and which are all described by Miss Thomson as "yearly payments." These amount to about £250 per annum, and the testatrix might well contemplate that a considerable sum of residue would fall to be retained in Mr Anderson's hands, which might annually be relieved as the annuities fell in or as their annuities were satisfied. But even if there were no such explanation I could not hold the use of the word "annually" as restricting an express bequest of residue to a bequest of the mere interest of residue, the effect being to produce intestacy or something equivalent thereto, for in the present question the setting up of the settlement of 1861 would have a very analogous effect. I hold therefore that Messrs Spencer, Bromhead, and Lindsay are, equally among them, Miss Thomson's residuary legatees.

There is no dispute as to Mr Robert Thomson's annuity of £100 a-year, nor as to the claims of Miss Howard and Isabella Lindsay, or as to the bequests of furniture or specific articles, and the only remaining question, which is, however, to my mind the most difficult question in the whole case, relates to the legacy of £4000 in favour of the brothers and sister of Miss Thomson's mother.

The Lord Ordinary has held that this bequest has been adeemed in consequence

No. 171.

July 17, 1877.

Anderson v. Thomson, &c.

No. 171. of the deposit-receipt, on which the money was originally in bank, having been July 17, 1877. uplifted and otherwise invested during the testator's lifetime.
 Anderson v. Thomson, &c.

With great difficulty, and I do not hesitate to say with the greatest possible reluctance, I feel myself compelled to agree with Lord Ormisdale and with the Lord Ordinary that this bequest has been adeemed by the sum in the deposit-receipt having been invested on real security under a bond taken in favour of Miss Thomson herself and her heirs and assignees whomsoever. I feel the authorities both in Scotland and England—some of which have been referred to by Lord Ormisdale—to be too strong to be overcome, although I am perfectly satisfied that Miss Thomson by adopting, on the suggestion of her agent, Mr Anderson, the heritable security, had no intention whatever to interfere with or take away the bequest which she had made in favour of her mother's brothers and sister and their issue. I think the ademption so effected produces in this case, and in many other similar cases, results of great hardship, and indeed I may say of great injustice—results which in England seem to have been mitigated to some extent by the 23d section of 1st Vict. cap. 26, which, however, does not apply to Scotland. I would very willingly have held, if I could, that the instruction to Mr Anderson in the testamentary writing of 23d March 1875, of which he knew nothing till Miss Thomson's death in June 1876, was an instruction not merely regarding a deposit-receipt (which, of course, was a document of a temporary nature, and implying only a temporary lodgment of the fund in bank at low interest till a better investment could be found), but an instruction regarding the fund itself wherever invested, and an instruction which would follow the fund itself wherever it could be traced. I regret more than I can express to be compelled to follow decisions which lay down, as I think, an arbitrary rule—a rule which, in the present case, is productive, as I cannot help thinking, of injustice; but I feel bound to administer the law, and not to amend it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the question as to whether the bequest of residue is one of liferent or fee I concur with your Lordships, and I have no farther observations to make. It is unnecessary to give a specific meaning to the word “annually.” There is a clear omission here, and the clause is inaccurate, but as it stands it imports a bequest of the fee of the residue and nothing else.

With regard to the legacy of £4000, I am very much in the position in which Lord Gifford has stated that he feels himself to be. The authorities are very strong, and looking to them I cannot see my way to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships. I wish, however, to make a few observations upon the general doctrine of ademption. It seems to have been laid down by Lord Thurlow, and to my mind too closely followed in subsequent decisions, that the intention of the testator to adeem in a question of ademption is not a matter to which the Court is to look. This is certainly a very unusual rule to lay down in construing a last will and settlement. Yet it has been laid down that in questions of ademption of legacies not only is the intention of the testator not to be the rule to be followed, but however clearly evinced, to be immaterial. This seems to be a deviation from the ordinary rules of construction.

The doctrine of ademption was derived originally from the Roman law, and is a clear principle of jurisprudence. It is simply a form of revocation requiring, of course, indications of an intention to revoke. No doubt, if a specific thing has been bequeathed and has then perished the bequest falls, although even in such circumstances the civil law supplied a remedy in particular cases. No. 171.

If a change was made in the position in which a specific legacy stood it is clear that in the Roman law the intention of the testator was considered. This is apparent from the following passage in the Institutes of Justinian:—"If a testator give his own property as a legacy, and afterwards alienate it, it is the opinion of Celsus that the legatee is entitled to the legacy, if the testator did not sell with an intention to revoke the legacy. The Emperors Severus and Antoninus have published a rescript to this effect. . . . If, again, a part of the thing given as a legacy be alienated, the legatee is of course still entitled to the part which remains unalienated, but is entitled to that which is alienated only if it appear not to have been alienated by the testator with the intention of taking away the legacy"—Sandars' Justinian, lib. ii. tit. 20, sec. 12). Now, it seems to me that that exposition of the judicial rule is founded on the clearest grounds of equity and justice. In the English cases, however, it has been decided that the intention of the testator is to be disregarded, and this view seems to have been followed in this Court, and very notably so in the cases of Pagan and Chalmers.

July 17, 1877.
Anderson v.
Thomson, &c.

I can only say that these decisions appear to me to be utterly at variance with any principle of jurisprudence.

To my mind the intention of the testator should be the sole rule. We are bound, however, by these judgments, and I can only express my want of coincidence in the principle upon which they have been decided.

The only remaining doubt I have in this case is one which I think it right to explain, namely, whether this is really a specific legacy at all? I think there are grounds for saying that it is a legacy of £4000, and nothing else. That view I am inclined to take, not so much from the words of the settlement, but from the circumstances. This £4000 was the balance of another transaction, and was deposited in bank for a fortnight for temporary custody, not as a permanent investment. Before the testatrix delivered this testamentary letter, and within a day of its date, she directed Mr Anderson to uplift the deposit-receipt, shewing that it was the money and not the obligation for it she meant to leave. She certainly did not mean Mr Anderson to keep the money; she meant him to invest it; which he did. But if the legacy attached to the £4000, placed by Anderson in his own bank account, it remained simply a money legacy when invested, it being plainly not the obligation but the amount for which it was granted which she meant to bequeath.

I think it far from clear that this is not a general legacy. But I do not place enough reliance on these doubts to induce me to differ from the judgment.

THE COURT adhered.

The unsuccessful claimants asked for their expenses out of the fund.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The frame-work of this letter is such as justified the parties in getting a judicial opinion on it, and the expenses must therefore come out of the residue.

WALLS & SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—
WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 172.

July 17, 1877.
Maxwell.SIR HERBERT EUSTACE MAXWELL, Compeerer.—Kinnear—Blair.
JOHN LATTA (William Maxwell's Tutor ad litem), Respondent.—
Lee—Moncreiff.

Entail—38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 12—Charging improvement debt—Death of heir.—Section 12, sub-section 3, of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, provides for applications under the Act being carried on by personal representatives and others, "according to their respective rights and interests," should the heir of entail die before decree had been obtained. Held that the provisions of this section were framed to regulate procedure only, and that this provision did not of itself confer a right upon the representatives of a deceased heir of entail to be sisted in a petition at his instance to charge improvement debt.

38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 11—Express Conveyance.—Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord President), that a general disponee of an heir of entail is not in the position of having "expressly" conveyed to him, in the sense of the 11th section of the "Entail Amendment Act, 1875," a sum of money which the heir of entail was, before his death, in course of charging against the estate as an improvement debt.

2D DIVISION,
with four Judges of the First Division.
Lord Adam.
R.

On 1st March 1877 Sir William Maxwell, Bart., of Monreith, as heir of entail in possession of the lands of Monreith and others, presented a petition under the "Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875" (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61), for leave to charge £8397 as improvement debt. The petition was duly served and intimated, and Mr Latta, S.S.C., was appointed tutor ad litem to William Maxwell, one of the respondents, who was in pupillarity. Remits were made to reporters, who were proceeding with the necessary inquiries when Sir William Maxwell died on 23rd March 1877. He left a disposition and settlement, dated 5th February 1867, wherein he assigned and disposed in general terms to his only son, Sir Herbert Eustace Maxwell, his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, for the purposes therein set forth. He also appointed Sir Herbert his sole executor.

On 18th May 1877 Sir Herbert lodged a minute in the petition process wherein he set forth the above facts, and also the 3d sub-section of section 12 of the "Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875,"* and craved that the Lord Ordinary should sist him as general disponee and executor of the late Sir William, and also, as heir of entail in possession, as petitioner in room and place of Sir William.

On 26th May 1877 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor—
"Refuses to sist Sir Herbert Eustace Maxwell as petitioner in room and place of the petitioner, his father, the late Sir William Maxwell."†

* 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 12,—“Subject to such rules in regard to matters in this section mentioned as the Court are hereby authorised and required to make by Act of Sederunt on or before the 15th day of November 1875, and thereafter from time to time to vary or extend as they shall see fit, the following provisions shall have effect with reference to all applications to the Court under this or any other Entail Act.

(3) Should the applicant die, his personal representative, or his successor in the entailed estate, or his disponee, legatee, or assignee, or any of them, according to their respective rights and interests, shall, except in the case of application in which it is necessary to obtain the consent or the dispensing with the consent of one or more heirs of entail, be entitled to be sisted in the process, at whatever stage the death may happen, and to prosecute the same.”

† NOTE.— . . . It was not disputed that the general disposition of Sir Herbert's favour was not sufficient to give him a title to the improvement expenditure in question under the 11th section of the Act, which requires the Sir Herbert Maxwell reclaimed. The case was debated before the Second Division on 14th June, and was by them appointed to be heard before seven Judges. No. 172.

 July 17, 1877.
 Maxwell.

Argued for Sir Herbert;—The policy of the Acts allowing heirs of entail to charge for money expended on improvements was to encourage such expenditure, and accordingly every facility was intended to be given to an heir of entail in recovering money so laid out. In construing the provisions of the present statute it was necessary to read the 11th and 12th sections together.* It was difficult to see upon what principle it was maintained that this right did not transmit. If a man had a right so vested in him that he could assign it, it would pass by force of law to his representatives ab intestato, or, as in this case, by force of general disposition. Otherwise an assignee would be in a better position than the original creditor. The original heir of entail who had expended the money created a right of credit in which the entailed estate was debtor, and that right was personal to him. Under the provisions of the Montgomery Act if an heir of entail preserved evidence of improvement expenditure in the manner therein provided the right to charge transmitted to his per-the sums expended shall be 'expressly' bequeathed or conveyed. As general disponee, therefore, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that Sir Herbert has no right or interest in the sums in question, and has no title to be sisted in that character.

"The Lord Ordinary is further of opinion that the fact of Sir Herbert having succeeded to and being in possession of the entailed estate does not give him any right or interest in these sums. In that character he is rather in the position of being a debtor than a creditor.

"But the 3d sub-section of the 12th section of the Act provides that parties shall be entitled to be sisted 'according to their respective rights and interests.' In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, Sir Herbert has no right or interest in the sums in question, and therefore has no title to be sisted in room and place of his late father."

* 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 11.—"Where any heir of entail in possession of an estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1846, shall have executed improvements on such estate of the nature contemplated by this or any other entail Act, as the case may be, and shall have died after the passing of this Act without having charged the estate with the amount which he is entitled to charge of the sums expended in such improvements, it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums, or any part thereof, to make application by summary petition to the Court, praying the Court, after such inquiry as to the Court shall seem proper, to find and declare that the sums specified in the petition, or any part thereof, have been expended on improvements on the said estate by the deceased heir of entail, and that the petitioner is in right thereof; and to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person such petitioner may think fit, a bond and disposition over the said estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or over some sufficient portion of the said estate other than as aforesaid, for the amount of which the deceased heir of entail himself might, under the provisions of these Acts, have charged the estate, which bond and disposition in security shall contain all clauses proper to be inserted in bonds and dispositions in security which, in virtue of this Act, may be granted by an heir of entail in possession for sums expended by himself on improvements on his estate; provided always, that the said sums shall only be deemed to be a debt against the entailed estate and the heirs of entail therein, and shall only bear interest from and after the date of the decree of the Court pronounced in such petition."

Section 12, supra, p. 1112, note.

No. 172. sonal representatives. The mere manifestation of an intention to charge was enough to make the right transmit in that case. Here the heir had actually presented his petition and was in the act of charging. Why should the right not transmit? The intention of the two Acts were the same, the only difference being that the present Act was one meant to enlarge the powers of the heir to charge. The presentation of the petition conferred a right upon the representative of the petitioner to get the judgment of the Court upon it. The word used in the statute was "expressly" not "specially," so, unless it was to be held that the particular debt must be conveyed to the representative, a general disposition would carry it and confer the privilege in the statute.

July 17, 1877.
Maxwell.

Argued for William Maxwell's tutor ad litem;—Sir William died at a time when he might still have withdrawn his application, and so there was no right to transmit to his representative unless he himself expressly mentioned it. The 12th section of the statute of 1875 applied only to procedure—it was so designed on the margin of the Act. Such a section could not confer a right which did not before exist. It was necessary for the persons enumerated in that section to shew that they had a right to go on with applications such as this. Moreover the section applied to all procedure under the Entail Acts, including disentailing, &c. Could it be said that the section conferred a right upon the personal representative of an heir born after 1848 to carry on a petition for disentail after the original petitioner's death? It had been held that even after an instrument of disentail had been executed and the consents obtained that disponees could not carry on the petition after the heir's death.¹ Under the 11th section an express conveyance was moreover necessary, and there was none such here. The right to charge was merely a personal faculty in the heir in possession, and did not form part of his estate. It was worthy of notice that the general conveyance which was said to include this sum was executed in 1867, long before the debt was in existence or the right to transmit it created by Act of Parliament.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In dealing with the question involved in this petition it is necessary to keep clearly in mind—what was rather overlooked in the course of the argument—the precise position of an heir of entail in possession who has expended money in improving his estate. He only occupies a position different from a fee-simple proprietor who has improved his landed property in this, that while a fee-simple proprietor may burden his heir or his heritage with sums so expended as he pleases, the heir of entail can only do so through the intervention of the Court under the entail statutes. But if in either case the proprietor takes no step to make the expenditure a burden on the land, the estate has the benefit, the money is spent, and that is the end of it; and in neither case has the personal representative of the proprietor who spent the money any claim against an estate which never belonged to him, or for repayment of money which never became a debt affecting that estate. In both cases the expenditure can only be raised into a debt by the voluntary act of the proprietor of the landed estate, and if he do no act for that purpose no debt is ever created.

It is therefore clear that a general settlement containing no express reference to the power which the granter had to make these sums a burden on the entailed estate could not possibly fulfil the conditions of the 11th section of the recent Entail Act, because such a settlement would be perfectly consistent with the absence of all intention on the part of the heir in possession to burden his entailed estate with the expenditure. Any power he had to do so arose, not from his expenditure of the money only, but from his having expended it as heir in possession, and this is clearly a power which was personal to him, and which ceased when he ceased to possess.

¹ Robertson v. Robertson, June 10, 1864, 2 Macph. 1178, 36 Scot. Jur. 590.

No. 172.

July 17, 1877.
Maxwell.

But the 11th section introduces an equitable remedy for cases in which the heir in possession clearly evinces his intention that the sums advanced for improvements shall burden, not his personal representatives, but the entailed property, although he has not adopted the statutory procedure. The words of the section are as follows—(reads—supra, p. 1113, note).

I think the word “express” quite sufficient for the purpose of the clause, and indeed more suitable than “special.” Any words bearing express reference to the sums in question which are sufficient to evince a testamentary intention to bequeath them will be due compliance with the requisites of this clause.

Express words stand in legal contrast to general words; nor do I think there is any obscurity in the meaning which should lead us to interpolate words into this clause which are not to be found in the statute. In the present case the sums in question have not been expressly conveyed to the petitioner, and therefore no right has accrued to him under this clause. The general conveyance which he holds bears no reference to the sums in question, and neither expressly nor by implication conveys them.

It will, however, be observed on the privilege here given that its quality is peculiar. The last heir in possession never was the creditor of the entailed estate in these sums, and therefore there was no debt constituted in his person, and thus none which he could convey or assign. What he had to bequeath was not debt, but the privilege created by this clause of the statute; and that is not the right or faculty which he himself had, for that could only be exercised by the proprietor of the land, but a distinct representative power different from any which the heir in possession ever had, and one to be made effectual not by the heir in possession, but against him. This last consideration leads me to doubt whether, whatever the true meaning of the 3d sub-section of section 12¹ of the statute may be, the provisions of the 11th section can ever be carried into effect by the representative sisting himself as a party in a petition like the present. The true remedy is pointed out and provided for in the statute; and the application by the representative therein provided will contain a prayer entirely different from that of the present petition.

As to the 3d sub-section of section 12, if it had stood by itself as a substantive enactment, it cannot be denied that its words admit of being read as if it conferred a universal right on representatives of all kinds—heirs, disponees, executors, assignees—to take up and follow out for their own benefit any petition presented under the Entail Statutes which had not been carried through in the lifetime of the person who presented it. A little consideration, however, will shew that even on its own terms this could hardly be its meaning, for the indiscriminate power thus supposed to be given to representatives, according to their respective rights, might lead to most anomalous and inextricable consequences. The applica-

¹ Supra, p. 1112, note.

No. 172.
July 17, 1877.
Maxwell.

tion may in many instances be such as an heir of entail in possession could alone act on if the petition were granted, of which indeed the case now under consideration is a good example; and if we are to assume that the object of the clause was to devolve on some one or other representative or successor the substantial title and interest in every such petition which may be depending at the death of an heir in possession, it would certainly require a very different set of provisions to define the persons to whom these rights are to descend with any chance of effectual application.

But when the context of this clause is considered all substantial difficulty as to its true meaning is removed. It is obviously a procedure clause merely, and it is only meant to provide that when the substantial interest in any such application does descend to representatives, or is capable of being and has been assigned, the representative may take up the depending petition, and need not be put to the expense of a new application.

This, I apprehend, may be fairly inferred from the fact that the 12th section is wholly a clause regulating procedure, so much so that its provisions are liable to be subject to rules made by the Court by Act of Sederunt—a consideration entirely inconsistent with the idea that it was intended to confer new and valuable patrimonial rights.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the result arrived at by the Lord Justice-Clerk. I do so on much narrower grounds.

This minute has been given in under sub-section 3 of section 12 of the Entail Amendment Act of 1875, and its object is that Sir Herbert Maxwell may be assisted in room and place of his father Sir William in an application made by Sir William to have money expended by him created a burden upon the entailed estate of Monreith.

I am of opinion that sub-section 3 of section 12 relates simply to forms of procedure. I have come to that conclusion upon two grounds, 1st, because the sub-section is both preceded and followed by other sub-sections, all of which relate to procedure, and procedure alone; 2d, because I cannot think that sub-section 3 had been intended to confer upon certain classes of persons patrimonial rights, which they would not otherwise have had, to improvement de facto a power would have been conferred, such as, in that view, must be held to have been conferred by section 12 upon this Court, from time to time, to vary or extend these rights, by Act of Sederunt, as the Court shall see fit. Upon these two grounds I concur in the proposed judgment.

As regards section 11 of the statute I am very clearly of opinion that the application made to us by this minute does not come within it. In the case provided for by section 11 application must be made by a substantive petition. We have no such petition here, and I therefore refrain from giving any opinion upon the construction of that section.

LORD ORMDALE.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and generally in the views which he has expressed. I only desire to make one observation with regard to section 12. I understood his Lordship to have said that this Court had the power to vary the provisions in the sub-sections. I doubt whether that is so. It rather appears to me upon consideration of the words of the section that the rules of Court or Acts of Sederunt which the Court may pass are what can be varied and not the provisions in the sub-sections.

the statute itself. With that observation, I entirely concur in the proposed judgment. No. 172.

July 17, 1877.
Maxwell.

LORD MURE, LORD GIFFORD, and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion with all your Lordships that the 12th section of this Act is directed entirely to matters of procedure. I am a great deal influenced in coming to this conclusion by the introductory words, in which it is expressly provided, “subject to such rules in regard to the matters in this section mentioned as the Court are hereby authorised and required to make by Act of Sederunt, and thereafter, from time to time, to vary or extend, as they shall see fit,” and that the provisions enacted in the section are enacted subject to such rules. I do not think that it follows from that that everything enacted in the section is subject to alteration, and I therefore agree with Lord Ormidale’s observation. I come to this conclusion because it is said in the sub-section that applications shall be competent, “except in the case of applications in which it is necessary to obtain the consent of one or more heirs of entail.” Now, I do not think we could apply the provisions of that sub-section to the excepted cases.

Apart from that I think that these sub-sections are intended generally to regulate procedure, and this 3d sub-section is directed to the question of sisting parties in such applications, if they have otherwise right and interest to insist in them.

With regard to the 11th section it is quite true, as Lord Deas has observed, that in order to dispose of Sir Herbert Maxwell’s minute it is not necessary to decide anything with regard to that section. But after having heard a full argument upon its construction, and seeing how nearly it touches the question before us, I think that we should not refrain from expressing the opinions which we have formed upon it. I may say therefore that—although not without difficulty—I have come to concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk as to that section also. The difficulty has arisen from the inaccurate use of language. The section says, “it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums or any part thereof.”

The word “express” is commonly opposed to “implied” and not to “general,” the word opposed to “general” being “special,” and so if “special” was intended there is here an inaccurate use of language.

But I think that it is not possible to sustain a general disposition, such as we have here, as coming within the provisions of this clause of the statute, as that would be utterly to deny all effect to the word “expressly.” I feel myself, however, bound to give effect to “express,” and the only effect I can give to it is to read it as “special,” and I am therefore of opinion that Sir Herbert Maxwell has no claim under section 11 either.

THE Second Division accordingly adhered to the Lord Ordinary’s judgment.

HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—JOHN LATTI, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 173.

THE SCOTTISH HIGHLAND DISTILLERY COMPANY (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—Trayner.
JAMES REID, Defender.—Fraser—Rhind.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

Property—Servitude of Dam.—An estate was sold in lots, two of the lots being the lands of A and B. The disposition in favour of the purchaser of A reserved to the purchaser of B “a right in common with the purchaser of the lot hereby disposed” to a dam (within the lands of A), and mill-lade “with right of access thereto for repairing the same.” The disposition in favour of the purchaser of B conveyed these lands “with a right also to our said disponee, in common with the proprietor of A,” to the dam and mill-lade, “and with right of access thereto for repairing the same.”

The dam had existed beyond the memory of man, and was used for a mill on A, as well as for mills on B.

The tenant of lands bounded by the burn which flowed from the dam, with the consent of the proprietor of A, proceeded to insert a pipe into the dam, with the view of taking advantage of the height of the stored water, to obtain a supply for his farm by means of a hydraulic ram, proposing to return the water not used by him to the burn before it reached the intake of the mill-lade leading to the B mills.

In an action of declarator and interdict at the instance of the proprietor of B, held that the pursuer was entitled to interdict against the defender interfering with or encroaching upon the dam, or the water stored therein, or executing any operations on the dam, reserving to the proprietor of A, and to the defender with his authority, all right competent to them to take the surplus water flowing over the dam by any means not injuriously affecting the dam, and not prejudicial to the defenders.

Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford) that the right of the proprietor of B was a servitude of dam and aqueduct.

Opinion (per Lord Ormisdale) that he had a right of joint property in the dam.

Observations (per Lord Gifford) on the distinction between a servitude of dam and aqueduct and other servitudes.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
R.

ABOUT 1855 certain lands near Peterhead belonging to trustees for the North of Scotland Banking Company were exposed for sale in lots under articles of roup.

Lot third, being the lands of Damhead or Invernettie Lodge, was purchased from the banking company by Provost Alexander of Peterhead. The disposition in his favour, dated 1865, reserved “to the purchaser of lot fifth, as described in the foresaid articles of roup, a right in common with the purchaser of the lot hereby disposed to the upper mill-dam and the mill-lade, with right of access thereto for repairing the same.”

In 1872 Mr George Whyte purchased also from the same authors a part of lot fifth, being the Invernettie Mills, and lands connected therewith. These subjects were disposed to him “with a right in common with the proprietor of those parts of Damhead, now called Invernettie Lodge, to the upper mill-dam, and the mill-lade, and with right of access thereto for repairing the same.”

In 1874 Whyte feued a portion of these subjects to the Scottish Highland Distillery Company, “with right to use the dams, mill-lades, sluices, &c., and right of access to the Damhead dam and sluice thereof, in common with the proprietors of the lands of Damhead or Invernettie Lodge.”

The dam in question was situated on Provost Alexander's lands of Damhead. It had been in existence beyond the memory of man, and was used for a mill on the Damhead property, as well as for the Invernettie Mills. The Invernettie Burn, which formed the dam, after leaving the dam, crossed under a public road, and then flowed between the lands of Damhead, and the lands of Meethill, of which last James Reid was tenant. About 200 yards from the sluice was the intake of a lade by which the greater part of the water was diverted to Inverniettie Mills. With the object of supplying his farm with water for cattle and domestic purposes Reid proposed to take advantage of the height to which the water was raised by the dam, in order to construct a hydraulic ram. Having obtained the verbal consent of Provost Alexander, he proceeded to insert the feed pipe of the ram into the dam. He proposed to return the whole of the water, in so far as it was not used for domestic purposes and cattle, to the burn, within the lands of Meethill, and above the intake of the lade leading to Inverniettie Mills.

No. 173.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

The Scottish Highland Distillery Company and Whyte objected to Reid's operations, and raised the present action of declarator and interdict against him. They maintained that they had a right in common with Provost Alexander to the dam, and that consequently he had no right to grant leave to any one to execute operations on the dam, or to take water therefrom without their consent. A proof was taken, in which the defender led evidence to shew that his operations would still leave enough water for the purposes of the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defender, James Reid, is not entitled, without the consent of the pursuers, to insert a pipe into the upper or Damhead dam on the lands of Damhead or Inverniettie Lodge, in order to enable him to construct and use a hydraulic ram: Finds (2) that the said defender is entitled to take water for the use of man and beast, and for the other primary uses of running water, from the Inverniettie Burn ex adverso of the lands of Meethill by means of a hydraulic ram, provided that the surplus water unused be returned to the said burn within the lands of Meethill, and above the intake of the covered lade leading to Inverniettie Mills: Therefore finds and declares that the pursuers are entitled to have the water of the said Inverniettie Burn transmitted to the said upper or Damhead dam and mill-lade, and to the said mills, lands, and others occupied and possessed by them, in the same course and quantity as they have flowed from time immemorial, but without prejudice to the said defender taking and using the said water for primary purposes as aforesaid: Further, finds and declares that the said defender is not entitled, without the consent of the pursuers, to interfere with or encroach upon the said upper or Damhead dam, or to interfere with or encroach on the water in use to be stored behind and within the said mill-dam, or to execute any operations on the said mill-dam without the consent of the pursuers: Further, finds and declares that the said defender is not entitled to execute any works or operations on the said burn or stream, or in connection therewith, whereby the water which has been in use to flow to and by the said mill-dam and mill-lade, and to and by the said lands and others occupied and possessed by them as aforesaid, may be abstracted or diminished in quantity, but without prejudice to the said defender taking and using the said water for primary uses aforesaid, and executing such operations as may be necessary or proper for that purpose: Further, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the said defender from executing any works or operations upon the said upper or Damhead dam, mill-lade, and works connected therewith, or from interfering with or encroaching on the water stored behind within the said dam, and decerns: Finds the said defender liable in expenses, but subject to modification," &c.*

* "NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts)—Such being the state of the facts of the pursuers and of Provost Alexander, it appears to the Lord Ordinary

No. 173. The defender reclaimed. Argued for him;—Had he taken water by a pipe from the burn as it passed his farm his right to do so would have been unquestionable, provided he took it, as he proposed to do, for primary purposes, and returned what was not so used to the burn before it left his farm. What he proposed to do was precisely the same, so far as the pursuers were concerned. He wished to catch the waste water before it left the dam, which would otherwise flow down into the burn.¹ The Lord Ordinary was in error in holding that the right of the pursuers in the dam was one of joint property. The terms of their titles gave them merely a right of servitude in the dam, and therefore they could not object to Provost Alexander taking or allowing the defender to take water from the dam, if their servitude was not thereby injuriously affected.² The proof shewed that abundance of water would remain for all the requirements of the pursuers. The defender was quite willing to avoid physical interference with the embankment. He was ready to conduct his operations at the sight of a man of skill appointed by the Court, so that no water would be taken from the dam except that which would otherwise have overflowed.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

Argued for the pursuers;—They were entitled, in the first place, to have the Lord Ordinary's judgment affirmed. Their right was one of joint property in the dam, but even if it was only a right of servitude they were entitled to prevent the threatened interference with the dam. As for the proposal made in the course of the debate it was plain that the defender would gain nothing by merely being allowed to take the surplus water from the dam, unless the pursuers were prevented from lowering the sluice, for by lowering the sluice a few inches they would render his machine useless. If he was allowed by the Court to have a machine at all in connection with the dam it would thus lay the foundation for very troublesome interference with the pursuers' rights.

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of opinion that the result reached by the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers and Provost Alexander have a right in common to the upper or Damhead dam, and are joint owners of the subjects. This being so, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that one of the owners of the common property has no power to grant authority to a third party, without the consent of the other owner or owners, to execute such operations on their common property as are proposed to be executed here. The Lord Ordinary does not think that Provost Alexander can give the defender a right to insert a pipe through the walls of the dam, and that whether it be for the purpose of taking away the water stored therein or the overflow water only.

"In the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of this case, as depending on the terms of quite recent titles derived from a common author, it is irrelevant and unnecessary to inquire into the state of possession of the subjects prior to the dates of these titles.

"Neither does he think it necessary that the pursuers should prove that they will suffer damage by the operations complained of, because he thinks that these operations amount to an unwarranted interference with their rights of property. So long as the operations of the defender are confined to taking only the overflow water from the dam he does not think it is proved that any sensible loss or injury would result to the pursuers. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that if the defender were allowed to establish a ram in connection with the mill-dam, he might, in course of time, acquire rights over the dam which might prove to be very inconvenient and prejudicial to the co-owners of the dam."

¹ Melville v. Dennison, May 21, 1842, 4 D. 1231.

² Erskine, ii. 9, 4; Bell's Prin. 987; Beveridge v. Marshall, Nov. 18, 1808. F. C.

in this case is substantially right, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary No. 173. reclaimed against ought to be adhered to, but in order to save the rights of parties, and to enable the defender, Mr Reid, with consent of Provost Alexander, or rather by authority of and by placing himself as in right of Provost Alexander, to take the surplus or overflow water, if he can do so without interfering with the dam and dam-dyke; and in order to reserve the right of Provost Alexander himself to secure that surplus or overflow water, if he can do so on his own ground, and without interfering with the existing dam or dam-dyke, I would suggest that a few words of reservation should be added to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The reservation which I would suggest is to the following effect:—

“Reserving to Provost William Alexander, as proprietor of the solum on which the said dam and its dam-dykes are constructed, and to his assignees, all right competent to him to take the surplus or overflow water flowing over the said dam by any means competent, not injuriously interfering with or affecting the said dam or dam-dykes, or prejudicial to the rights of the Scottish Highland Distillery Company, or of their author, Mr George Whyte.”

July 17, 1877.
Scottish Highland Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

It is implied in what I have just said that I think Provost Alexander is the sole proprietor of the solum upon which the dam and dam-dykes in question are constructed. Speaking for myself, I have found it indispensable, for the due and satisfactory decision of the case, to form a definite and distinct opinion as to what are Provost Alexander's rights, and what are the rights of the distillery company, in the dam in question, with its accessories, and I have come to the conclusion that Provost Alexander is the sole proprietor of the solum. The whole ground is embraced within the boundaries and limits of Provost Alexander's titles, whereas the distillery company in their titles, or in those of their author, George Whyte, have nothing more than “a right to” or a “right to use” the dam, mill-lades, and aqueducts, with a right of access thereto for repairing the same. In short, I am of opinion, so far as I can judge from the titles before us, that the case is just an ordinary instance of the well-known prædial servitude of mill-dam and aqueducts. The dominant tenement is the mills or distillery belonging to the Scottish Highland Distillery Company, the servient tenement is the solum or ground belonging to Provost Alexander, and the obligation upon the servient tenement is to suffer a mill-dam, with all necessary dam-dykes, mill-lades, and aqueducts, and accessories, to be constructed and maintained thereon for the use and behoof of the dominant tenement, the distillery in question. Any other view, I think, is untenable. A good test is to ask whether the distillery company or Mr Whyte could alienate their right to use the dam, and give the use of it to a different property altogether, belonging to some third party, and situated in a different place. I think clear they could not do so. They can only use their right for the purposes of the dominant tenement, and for no other or different subject.

I do not think it makes any difference to the nature of the right that Provost Alexander is not only proprietor of the solum of the servient tenement, but has so a right in common with the distillery company to use the dam and aqueducts for behoof of his own mill situated upon his own lands. This right gives Provost Alexander, in common with the distillery company, the joint enjoyment of the dam, dam-dykes, and aqueducts, but it does not alter the nature of the right, which, I think, is simply a right of servitude of dam and aqueduct, the servient tenement being Provost Alexander's land.

But when a third party, such as the defender, Mr Reid, either in his own right

No. 173. or as in right of Provost Alexander, proposes to take part of the water confined by the dam, and to avail himself for any purpose whatever of the height to which the water in the dam is artificially raised by being confined by means of the dam-dykes, it is necessary to consider with some degree of exactness and precision what is the precise nature of the servitude of dam and aqueduct, and what are the precise rights which the proprietor of the servient tenement can claim without the permission or consent of the dominant tenement.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

I think that the servitude of dam and aqueduct differs from many other prædial servitudes in this, that it gives the dominant tenement not only a right and privilege to use the property of the servient tenement in a particular way, but it confers a special right to place and to maintain upon the solum of the servient tenement an opus manufactum or special erection of an extensive and complicated kind. The dam requires dam-dykes, with sluices and channels of various kinds. The aqueducts require retaining walls, with channels and all necessary appliances, and all these have to be constructed and maintained upon the land or solum of the servient tenement. Thus the servitude of dam and aqueduct differs from a mere right of way or similar servitude or easement in this, that it gives a right permanently to occupy and cover the solum of the servient tenement by erections and works. In most cases probably the dominant tenement has to construct the works at first; in all cases the dominant tenement has to keep them in sufficient repair, so as not to injure the servient tenement by leakage or overflow. Now, I am of opinion that several important consequences result from the fact that the dominant tenement not only uses the land of the servient, but has a right to place and maintain thereon, and has actually placed thereon, special, and, it may be, extensive structures. One consequence, I think, is that the servient tenement or its owner cannot interfere with or use these special structures without the consent of the dominant owner, even although such use should not appreciably injure the uses of the dominant tenement itself. For example, he who has a right of aqueduct may frequently exercise his right by means of pipes running in or over the servient land. But these pipes, though upon or actually embedded in the servient land, are not the property of the servient owner; they remain the sole and exclusive property of the dominant owner, by whom they were originally provided, and by whom they are maintained. The owner of the land in or on which they run cannot, for his own purposes, and apart from special bargain or stipulation, pierce them or alter their construction in any way without the consent of their owner, nor will he be permitted to do so without stipulation to that effect, though it should be shewn that his alteration will not materially injure the radical use of the pipe. In like manner if, in virtue of a servitude of support, I rest my beams or my pillars upon my neighbour's wall or ground, the beams or pillars will remain my property, and my neighbour although they rest upon his wall or land, must not, without my consent, interfere therewith, or use them for his own purposes. So if I give my neighbour, by special agreement, a right to throw an iron bridge or gangway over my close, and he does so, the iron bridge or gangway will not become my property because it is upon or over my ground, and I will have no right to use it for any purpose whatever without its owner's consent. He has bought from me a right to place it there, but unless there is some special bargain it does not thereby become mine or available for my use. It is his and not mine, and although he has purchased the right of putting it across my property he has not, unless there be a special bargain, agreed to give me any use thereof or any right therein. No. 173.

Now, applying these principles to the case of the servitude of dam and aqueduct, where no special stipulations appear, I think the servient tenement as such has no right to interfere with the structures which the dominant tenement has made, or is maintaining in virtue of its right. Provost Alexander simply, qua servient owner, and supposing he had no right in common with the distillery, could not, I think, have pierced the distillery's embankments, or introduced pipes into their dam, or meddled with or altered their sluices, or even availed himself, as a mechanical power, of the height to which the distillery company have raised the water. If he wants such right he must buy it or get it by agreement, and if it does not prejudice the distillery the price will be so much less.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

Nor does it affect the present question that Provost Alexander is not only owner of the solum, but has a common right to the dam and aqueducts. He is, as it were, besides being servient, a quasi dominant owner, for although res sua nemini servit, and Provost Alexander cannot in strictness be called dominant owner, he has a right in common with, and of exactly the same nature as, the right of the distillery company. As in a question with the distillery company that company and Provost Alexander are simply common servitude holders, and as such common proprietors of the opus manufactum of the works and structures which have been placed and which they jointly maintain upon the solum of the servient tenement, and as between them the general rule applies, which applies to all common proprietors, that neither joint owner can apply the common subject to a special or extraordinary use without the consent of the co-owner. All the owners must concur if any material alteration is to be made on the common subject which is not necessary for its common use.

I have hitherto assumed that the defender, Mr Reid, is in the full right and place of Provost Alexander, and entitled to do everything which might be done by Provost Alexander himself, and I have thus taken the most favourable view for Mr Reid. But Mr Reid is hardly in this position. He holds no conveyance or assignation from Provost Alexander; he has not even any written consent or authority, and Provost Alexander is not a party to the present process. All that the defender has is a verbal statement made by Provost Alexander as a witness that he does not object to the defender's proposed operations. The defender will do well to consider if this is enough. Certainly in strictness he ought to have begun by taking an assignation or conveyance from Provost Alexander, putting him entirely as in Provost Alexander's rights, for without this he has no title to set a foot on the solum of the dam, or of the ground surrounding it.

It only remains to consider who has right to take and use the surplus or overflow water, which, after the dam is full, flows over it as waste water, and escapes by the channels or means provided for it as not needed for the purposes of the dam, and rejoins the natural channel of the stream. Now, this waste or overflow water flows over and upon Provost Alexander's ground, and it seems clear enough to me that if he can take it without interfering with the rights of the distillery company he is entitled to do so, and that at any point of its fall over the dam-dyke. The dominant tenement, that is, the distillery company and Mr Whyte, have a right to fill the dam, and to use the water therein for their purposes, conveying it by the aqueducts. But after the dam is full and overflows they seem to me to have no right or interest whatever in the overflow water, which

No. 173. belongs to the servient tenement, under the usual conditions that it must be so used as not to interfere with the rights of inferior heritors. The owner of the servient tenement, that is, Provost Alexander, may catch it as he pleases and where he pleases on his own ground, and use it in any way he pleases, provided only he restores it to the natural channel before it enters the land of the next inferior proprietor, and it is to save this right that I would suggest the reservation which I have proposed.

July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

LORD ORMIDALE.—(After stating the facts)—Such being the state of the titles, both of Mr Alexander and Mr Whyte, in relation to the mill-dam and lade in dispute, I find it impossible to distinguish the character of their rights, that is to say, to hold that the right of the one is proprietary, while the right of the other is merely of the nature of a servitude. If it had been intended to reserve from Mr Alexander and to confer on Mr Whyte a privilege or right of servitude merely of taking water from the dam I should have expected that to have been expressed in so many words. But when I find the right conveyed to Mr Whyte described as one in common with Mr Alexander I do not see how the one can be that of a servitude merely and the other a right of property. I do not understand how two rights, essentially different, could be called rights in common. Nor do I see how it being added to Mr Whyte's right to the mill-dam and lade that he is also to have a right of access thereto for repairing the same can be taken as indicating that the whole right was merely one of servitude, for supposing Mr Whyte's right to the mill-dam and lade to be a proprietary one, it would still be necessary for him to have a right of access over Mr Alexander's ground, which surrounds the dam and lade, for repairing the same. And just as little do I think it correct to say that Mr Whyte's title contains no disposition to the mill-dam and lade, for in point of fact the right given to them forms, part of the dispositive clause in his title, just as much as the lands themselves and teinds thereof.

I therefore, for these reasons, shortly stated, must concur with the Lord Ordinary in opinion that the pursuer, Mr Whyte, has a proprietary right in the mill-dam and lade in question, and, consequently, that the defender is not entitled to insert a pipe as proposed by him into the same without leave from the pursuer, Mr Whyte, as well as Mr Alexander; and that it is irrelevant for the defender to say that his doing so will not cause any injury or prejudice to the pursuers.

But, if I were to hold that the pursuers' right is merely of the nature of a servitude or privilege, it would follow that Mr Alexander, as owner of the servient tenement, would be entitled to allow, as he has done, the defender to insert a pipe as proposed into the dam for the purpose of taking away the overflow of water, provided no material injury or prejudice would thereby be occasioned to the pursuers. And, in this view, the evidence of the defender's skilled witness, Willet, could not, I think, be ignored, and the offer made by him at the debate to allow the proposed operations to go on at the sight of some person to be appointed by the Court to see that no injury was done to the pursuers could not be disregarded. A servitude, being a restraint upon property, the defender, as in the place of Mr Alexander, the owner of the servient tenement, cannot be prevented from exercising his right in any way a proprietor is entitled to do, so long as the party to whom the servitude is due is not injured or prejudiced, as is very well illustrated by the case of Beveridge v. Marshall, 18th

November 1808, F.C. where it was held that the proprietor of a stream of water liable to a servitude of watering cattle might cover over the rest of the stream so as to exclude cattle, provided they left open a part of it sufficiently extensive to admit the reasonable exercise of the servitude.

No. 173.
July 17, 1877.
Scottish High-
land Distillery
Co. v. Reid.

Before concluding, it is right I should notice a question which was mooted at the debate, viz., whether the right of Mr Whyte, supposing it to be in any sense or to any extent a proprietary one, includes the solum of the dam and lade, or only the water and embankment and sluices. I rather think it is unnecessary to determine this question, which is not substantively raised in the record, for clear it is that, in either view, Mr Whyte would be entitled to prevent the proposed operations being carried into effect.

Nor do I think that it can avail the defender now to say, after finding the judgment of the Lord Ordinary adverse to him, that he is ready to give up his proposal to insert a pipe into the dam, or interfere with it in any way, as he finds he can accomplish his object without doing so. It is sufficient to remark that in the record the insertion of a pipe into the dam is stated by the defender to be his intention. It is in consequence of that threatened interference with the pursuers' right of property that they have brought the present action, and have obtained from the Lord Ordinary the necessary interdict. But the defender is at liberty to do anything lawful he pleases not struck at by the Lord Ordinary's judgment, it being, of course, open to the pursuers to object to his proceedings, and apply for another interdict against him if wrongful or prejudicial to them. But with such other proceedings the Court have nothing to do in the present action.

In the circumstances as now explained, and for the reasons I have stated and those stated by the Lord Ordinary, the interlocutor reclaimed against ought, in my opinion, to be adhered to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur substantially in the opinion of Lord Gifford. I think that the right in the dam which Whyte obtained, and which he transferred to the distillery company, was one of servitude only, and not one of property. It is very material to have that clearly fixed, in order that the rights of parties may be properly understood.

The dam has existed long beyond the memory of man. It was used to supply the home mill of Damhead, but it was also used to supply the Invernettie Mills, to which the distillery company have succeeded. In short, these mills had a valid servitude over the dam. That Whyte got no title of property in the dam, I think, clear from these considerations: In the first place, it is not very probable that he should have had conferred upon him a feudal right of property in a bit of ground to which he had no right of access except by stipulation; such a right might be conferred, but it is not a very natural kind of right in the circumstances. In the next place, Provost Alexander's title is a title with a reservation, "reserving from the lot above disposed to the purchaser of lot fifth, as described in the foresaid articles of roup, a right in common with the purchaser of the lot hereby disposed to the upper mill-dam and the mill-lade, with right of access thereto for repairing the same," which plainly implies that if the reservation had not been there the disposition to Alexander would have carried the absolute and unrestricted property of the solum of the dam. What is reserved is not the dam, but a right in common with the disponee to the dam, that is, to use it. It is a burden on Alexander's right which is created. This

No. 173. is made quite clear from the terms of the distillery company's own title. They get the "right to use the dams, &c., and right of access to the Damhead dam." July 17, 1877. In short, I do not see how it is possible to regard their right as other than one Scottish Highland Distillery Co. v. Reid. of servitude.

But then it does not follow that the distillery company may not have the right of preventing operations on the dam over which they have a right of servitude, and which they have not only a right to keep in repair, but are perhaps under an obligation to repair. Whether this be so or not the servitude holder has a very specific right in relation to the opus manufactum, even although the feudal right is not transferred. Lord Gifford seems inclined to hold that the right of the servitude holders is an actual right of property in the opus manufactum, embankments, walls, sluices, &c. As far as the moveable machines are concerned I think that this is the case, but I doubt whether the earthen embankment can be said to belong in property to the servitude holders. Still their right in the embankment may be of such a character as to entitle them to prevent any alteration in the structure, and to prevent perforation or other operations on the embankment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, with the following addition and alteration, namely, that the defender, the said James Reid, shall be bound and obliged to restore the surplus water not used by him for primary purposes, either at the place mentioned in the interlocutor reclaimed against, or, in his option, at any point of the covered lade mentioned therein, from the intake thereof to where it leaves the farm of Meethill, reserving to Provost Alexander, as proprietor of the solum in which the dam and dam-dykes are constructed, and to his assigns, or to the said James Reid, with his authority and consent, all right competent to them to take the surplus water flowing over the said dam, by any means not injuriously affecting the said dam or dam-dykes, and not prejudicial to the Scottish Highland Distillery Company, or to the pursuer, George Whyte: Find the said James Reid liable in additional expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but subject to modification: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause," &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 174. SIR ROBERT CHARLES SINCLAIR AND ANOTHER (Sinclair's Executors), First Parties.—Asher—Mackintosh.
July 18, 1877. JOHN GIBSON AND OTHERS (Campbell's Trustees), Second Parties.—
Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell's Trustees, et al. Kinnear—Pearson.
ANDREW FLETCHER, Third Party.—Kinnear—Pearson.

Teinds—Interim Locality—Bona fide Perception—Prescription.—Held in conformity with Weatherstone v. Marquis of Tweeddale (12 S. p. 1), that when payments of stipend are made under an interim decret of locality there is an implied judicial contract that when the legal obligations of the heritors are determined by final decret their several interests shall be adjusted from the commencement of the process according to the true state of their rights, and therefore that claims of relief thus arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settlement of a final scheme and decret may have been delayed, and that the defence of bona fide consumption cannot be sustained.

THE ministers of Haddington obtained decrees of augmentation in 1797, 1807, and 1826. These augmentations were paid under interim schemes of locality till 1861, when a final scheme was approved of. By interim localities in 1800, 1816, and 1826, no part of the stipend was allocated on the lands of Wester Monkrigg.

These lands were purchased in 1808 by General Campbell's trustees. They conveyed them in 1825, by disposition and deed of entail, to Andrew Fletcher of Salton, who sold them under a private Act of Parliament in 1833. Between 1808 and 1833 an amount of stipend was allocated upon the lands of Stevenson in the parish belonging to Sir John G. Sinclair in excess of what would have been allocated had the lands of Wester Monkrigg been localled upon.

The liability of the lands of Wester Monkrigg for stipend was the subject of litigation in a process of locality in which final decree was pronounced in 1710. The proprietor craved absolutor, in respect his lands were kirk lands feued out cum decimis inclusis before the Act of Annexation, and that they were never in use of paying any part of the stipend; and Lord Fountainhall (Ordinary) found that "the said lands, in respect of the writs produced, and that they were never in use of payment, could not be liable in any part of the stipend." This finding was not brought under review, and effect was given to it in the decret of locality finally pronounced, by which no part of the stipend was allocated upon the lands. The proceedings shewed that at this time there was sufficient free teind without localing on heritors who had heritable rights.

The leading title then produced by the proprietor was a charter in 1545 by the Abbot of Newbattle, by which the lands are feued out cum decimis inclusis, but without the words et nunquam antea separatim; and in all the subsequent titles, including the disposition to Campbell's trustees, the lands were conveyed in the same terms.

In 1835 some of the other heritors objected, for the first time, to the exemption of Monkrigg. The proprietor founded on the proceedings in 710 as res judicata. But this plea was overruled by the House of Lords, and the exemption was no longer insisted in. The lands were localled on for stipend in an interim locality in 1853, and in the final scheme.

In these circumstances a special case was presented to the Court, in which Sir J. Sinclair's trustees, first parties, claimed payment in relief of the overpayments made by their author. For the period between 1808 and 1825 they claimed such payment from Campbell's trustees (second parties) so far as they had trust-funds in their hands, and from Mr Fletcher (third party) so far as there was a deficiency of funds. For the period between 1825 and 1833 they claimed relief from the third party.

The second and third parties maintained that they were not liable, in respect—(1) That during the period of their possession the said lands were exempt from liability for stipend by a subsisting judgment of the Court; (2) that the whole rents of the said lands, stock and teind, were received and consumed in bona fide; (3) that as they have ceased to be heritors in the parish of Haddington for more than forty years all claims against them in that capacity were prescribed.

The questions submitted to the Court were—“(1) Are the second or third parties, or either and which of them, bound to recoup to the first parties the sum of stipend overpaid by the predecessor of the first parties, and unpaid by the second and third parties during the period between 1808 and 1825? (2) Is the third party bound to recoup to the first parties the sums of stipend overpaid and unpaid as aforesaid during the period between 1825 and 1833?”

No. 174.
July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.
1st DIVISION.
B.

No. 174. Argued for the second and third parties ;—An overpaying heritor, though entitled to have matters put right for the future, cannot recover back payments, if the underpaying heritor can plead a probable title. Here there was a final judgment,—the interlocutor of Lord Fountainhall adhered to by the Court.¹ There had been bona fide possession.² That might not be a good defence against a minister claiming arrears of stipend, but it was good against a titular or another heritor.³

July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.

Argued for the first party ;—The decree of locality in 1710 did not proceed on the footing that these lands had a decimæ inclusæ right. It appeared that there was enough of free teind without localising on heritors having heritable rights, and the effect of the locality was only to give the proprietor the benefit of a heritable right. There was no room for the plea of bona fide consumption, as in every interim locality there was an implied contract that the heritors should account to each other after the final scheme had determined their rights.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—The second parties to this case, the trustees of the late General Fletcher Campbell of Salton, bought the lands of Wester Monkkrigg, and obtained a conveyance, with entry to the lands at Martinmas 1808. They were infeft in these lands, and they held them as part of the trust-estate down to the year 1825. But in that year, in compliance with the directions of the trust-deed, they conveyed them along with other lands, under the fetters of an entail, to the present Mr Fletcher of Salton. From that time he was the owner of the lands of Wester Monkkrigg, as heir of entail in possession, until 1833, when Wester Monkkrigg was again sold under the powers of a private Act of Parliament.

The question we have to determine regards the liability of the owners of these lands to account for certain under-payments, or rather non-payments, under interim decrees of locality in subsistence during the whole of the period from 1808 to 1833. It appears that the first of the processes of augmentation to which those localities had reference was pronounced upon the 25th February 1797. There were two other augmentations that followed upon that, and interim schemes of locality were approved of first of all under the first decree of augmentation, and afterwards under the joint processes. There is no doubt that these interim localities were the subsisting rule of payment of the minister's stipend during the whole of the period from 1808 to 1833. It was not till a considerably later date that the final scheme of locality was approved of by the Court. Now under these interim schemes the proprietor of Monkkrigg paid no stipend at all, and the consequence of course was that the burden of paying the stipend fell upon the other heritors in the parish ; and it is matter of admission in this case that the first parties or their predecessors, in consequence of the lands of Wester Monkkrigg paying no stipend, had to pay more than their own shares, as the matter was finally adjusted, by £81, 9s. 3d., being £44, 3s. for the period between 1808 and 1825, and £37, 6s. 3d. for the period between 1825 and 1833.

¹ Lord Blantyre v. Earl of Wemyss, May 22, 1838, 16 S. 1009, H. of L. April 22, 1844, 3 Bell's App. 34 ; Cuthbert v. Waldie, Jan. 24, 1840, 2 P. 447, 12 Scot. Jur. 296 ; Mag. of Montrose v. King's College of Aberdeen, Nov. 12, 1834, 2 D. 457, note.

² Begg v. Rigg, July 3, 1751, Elchies, Bona et Mala Fides, No. 7, M. 1719. Elder v. Fotheringham, Jan. 8, 1869, 7 Macph. 341, 41 Scot. Jur. 199.

³ Haldane v. Ogilvy, Nov. 8, 1871, 10 Macph. 62.

⁴ Weatherstone v. Marquis of Tweeddale, Nov. 12, 1833, 12 S. 1, 6 Scot. Jur. 89.

Of course these sums will bear interest, but we need not trouble ourselves with details in answering the questions put to us in this case. No. 174.

Now, the reason why the proprietors of Wester Monkrigg paid no stipend was that there was an erroneous impression that the proprietor of these lands held his lands upon a title cum decimis inclusis et nunquam antea separatis; but this was afterwards, in 1835, found to be an entire mistake. The title, as a decimæ inclusæ title, was clearly invalid in law; and the consequence is, as the first parties contend, that the proprietors of Monkrigg, for the period now in question, must reimburse the first parties of that portion of the stipend which they ought to have paid, and which the predecessors of the first parties paid in their place.

July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.

Now, it appears to me that, apart from any speciality in the present case arising from subsequent proceedings in the beginning of the last century, which have been referred to, the application of the doctrine established in Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale is very clear.¹ This is just a case where an interim locality has been adjusted as the immediate rule of payment. There is reserved to all parties to fix in the ultimate accounting, when the final decree of locality comes to be made up, what are their rights and liabilities. It is in vain to say that anybody who is underpaying or escaping from paying under an interim scheme of locality, when he ought to have paid, is in the meantime consuming his teinds in bona fide, so as to afford him a defence in the ultimate accounting. The principle of the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale is as clear as possible against that. The Lord Ordinary in that case was Lord Moncreiff, a great authority in teind law, and he found distinctly in his interlocutor, "that where payments of stipend are made under interim decreets of locality there is an implied judicial contract among all the parties that when the legal obligations of the heritors shall be determined by decret their several interests shall be adjusted from the commencement of the process or processes, according to the true state of their rights and obligations, and that the claims of relief thus arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settlement of a final locality may have been delayed." That judgment was adhered to by the Inner-house; and Lord Balgray, who was also a great authority in teind questions, takes his opinion of the nature of an interim scheme of locality thus:—"As to the nature of an interim locality, it is a temporary arrangement introduced, inter alia, for the convenience of the minister. It fixes nothing irrevocably as to questions of accounting among the heritors themselves. A heritor paying in virtue of an interim locality does so under the legal warrant of this Court, whereby he is authorised to look forward to redress if he overpays."

Now, to say that it is a sufficient foundation for bona fide perception and consumption during the subsistence of an interim scheme of locality that the heritor believes he has a good title to the teinds which exempts him from payment is to set aside that doctrine altogether.

It follows of absolute necessity, from the doctrine thus announced by those eminent Judges, that there can, under an interim scheme of locality, be no bona fide perception or consumption of that portion of the teinds which ought to have gone to the minister.

The second and third parties here have founded very much on the doctrine of bona fide perception under a final decret of locality, and have cited the cases of ¹ Nov. 12, 1833, 12 S. 1, 6 Scot. Jur. 89.

No. 174. The Magistrates of Montrose v. King's College, Aberdeen, and Cuthbert v. Waldie; but the best answer to that argument is to be found in the note of the Lord Ordinary in the first of these cases. He fortunately happens to be the same Lord Ordinary who decided Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, and the distinction which he draws between bona fides as applicable to the payments or non-payments under a final and interim scheme is well worthy of attention, for it is stated in a very few words. He says:—"In the debate the pursuers relied mainly on the late decision in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale. But it is clear from the reports of that case that it depended in the material point" (that is, the point in question) "entirely on the fact that the payments had all been made under interim decrees of locality. In the rubrics given in both reports it is precisely so stated. It is so, expressly, in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and note; and in the opinions of all the Judges, as reported by Messrs Shaw, &c., the point is laid expressly on the peculiarity of an interim decree, as implying that an ultimate adjustment is to take place, in contrast with the nature and effect of a final decree."

July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.

It appears to me, therefore, that it is quite settled law that under-payments made under an interim scheme of locality will, when the final adjustment comes to be made, subject the under-paying heritor to a claim at the instance of the over-paying heritor, and that he cannot defend himself on the principle of bona fide consumption.

But then it is said that there is more in this case, and that the peculiarities of this parish and of the lands of Wester Monkrigg are such as to take it out of the rule of the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale. Now, what is the history of this parish as regards localities? There was a locality in dependence at the commencement of last century, and in that locality the proprietor of Wester Monkrigg brought forward what he called a decimæ inclusæ right, and insisted that upon that ground he should be exempt from payment of any stipend; and we find that Lord Fountainhall pronounced an interlocutor whereby he found that "the said lands, in respect of the writs produced, and that they were never in use of payment, could not be liable in any part of the stipend."

Now, the first observation to be made on that interlocutor, as it is called, is that it is not a judgment of the Lord Ordinary in any proper sense of the term. It is merely a finding pronounced in the course of the preparation of the final scheme of locality. It is an intimation of the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, but it has no judicial force or effect, according to the forms of process then in existence, until it comes to be brought before the Court when the final scheme of locality is approved of. Under our present forms of process a judgment pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in the course of preparing a locality may be brought under review, because it is a proper interlocutor, and accordingly it is constantly the subject of a reclaiming note to one of the Divisions. But at the time we are dealing with—the commencement of last century, and for more than a century after that—all that a Lord Ordinary could do in a process of locality was to express his opinion ad interim, and then in the end to make a report to the Teind Court. The Commissioners for Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds then for the first time pronounced any judgment when they approved of the scheme of locality adjusted as a final scheme.

Well, then, in the second place, observe what is the opinion that Lord Fountainhall intimates here. It is, that in respect of the writs produced, Wester Monkrigg could not be liable for any part of the stipend. Is that sustaining a plea to the effect that the proprietor of Wester Monkrigg has a title to his teind of the nature of a title cum decimis inclusis et nunquam antea separatis? I certainly do not so believe. A heritable right to his teinds was quite sufficient to justify that opinion of Lord Fountainhall, because, as it is shewn, it was not necessary in allocating the stipend at that time to go against heritors having heritable rights at all. There was sufficient teind in the hand of the titular without going against the heritors possessing heritable rights; and the mere possession of a heritable right to his teind, which the proprietor of Wester Monkrigg had, was quite sufficient to justify this opinion of Lord Fountainhall. Then, when the Court in approving of the final scheme of locality in 1710 gave effect to this opinion of Lord Fountainhall, how can they possibly be supposed to have been sustaining a title cum decimis inclusis et nunquam antea separatis? They had no occasion to direct their attention to any such question, and they do not find in this opinion of Lord Fountainhall that such a question was raised, and therefore the only judicial act in the matter—the only proper judgment—namely, that approving the final scheme of locality, had it not in contemplation to determine any question as to a decimæ inclusæ right at all.

No. 174.
July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.

Then it is said that under this first decret, which is assumed to have determined that the proprietor of Wester Monkrigg had a decimæ inclusæ right, there has been bona fide possession ever since. There is no doubt there was possession in bona fide of the entire teinds of the lands of Wester Monkrigg by the proprietor of these lands for ninety years after this final locality was approved of. There is no doubt about that, and nobody is seeking to disturb that possession. It is possession under a final decret of locality, and it is not brought in question in this case in any form. But, then, when the new augmentation came to be awarded in 1797, and when under that and subsequent decreets of augmentation interim schemes of locality came to be prepared, these were attended with the usual consequences. Whatever your rights may be, you, the heritors of this parish, are not to be prejudiced by paying under these interim schemes, because it remains to be subsequently adjusted and settled who are the heritors truly liable for the stipends, and in what proportions. That is the condition on which every interim scheme of locality is approved of, and made a rule for interim payment of stipend, and that is just what has been done in this case. These interim schemes have come to an end, and a final locality has been approved of; and it is now found that this gentleman, who was the proprietor of Wester Monkrigg in 1710, had no right to his teinds beyond the mere ordinary heritable right, and that none of the proprietors of Wester Monkrigg from that time forward have ever had any higher right than that, and accordingly they fall to be localled upon for the future, as the proprietor himself admits.

Well, if that is to be so for the future, why is it not to be for the past, while the interim schemes have been in subsistence. Oh! because I have possessed in bona fide. But that is distinctly overruled in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, and the circumstance that the party advances this decimæ inclusæ right more than half a century ago, will not in the slightest degree prevent the application of that rule, because nobody ever admitted his right, and, above all, nobody ever admitted his right of a decimæ inclusæ title when there came to be any question as to whether or not he should pay any part of the stipend.

It seems to me, therefore, that the specialties of this case do not in the

No. 174. slightest degree prevent the application of the general rule, which was settled in the case of Weatherstone, and which has been acted on ever since in adjusting the over-payments and under-payments under an interim scheme.

July 18, 1877.

Sinclair's

Trustees v.

Campbell's

Trustees, et al.

I am therefore for answering the first question by finding that the second parties, who were proprietors of the estate of Wester Monkrigg in the period from 1808 to 1825, are bound to reimburse the first parties all the sums of stipend admittedly overpaid by them during that time; and in answer to the second question, that the third party (Mr Fletcher), who was owner of the estate from 1825 to 1833, is also bound to reimburse the first parties.

LORD DEAS.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is quite fixed in our law and practice that in order that the minister may have the means of livelihood while the process of locality is going on, and which often lasts for a great number of years, he is entitled to demand an interim scheme; and it is equally well settled in our law and practice that the result is, that when the final locality comes to be adjusted those heritors who have been overpaying under that interim scheme are entitled to be reimbursed by those heritors who have been underpaying under it. No doubt when the process lasts for a long period of years there may be a hardship felt by the underpaying heritors when the demand comes to be made upon them at the end of that period by the overpaying heritors. But I am not aware that it makes any difference, as regards that claim for relief, whether interim schemes have been allowed to be acted on, by all concerned, for a short period of years or for a long period; and no case has been referred to in the very able and elaborate pleadings at the bar in which that relief was refused. As regards any specialties in this case, I think there are none to prevent the application of that general rule. Looking to the exposition which your Lordship has given, both of the law and of the facts of this case, I think it would be quite superfluous in me to say more than I have done. I entirely concur with the views stated by your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is perfectly settled by the decision in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, and by the same eminent Judge in the other case mentioned in the course of the argument, that payments of this sort, made under the interim scheme, are to be adjusted by the final scheme, and that when there is an under-payment it must be paid, and when an over-payment it must be reimbursed. On the other hand, where over-payments have been made under final decreets they do not admit of being adjusted in the same way. I do not think that in this case there can be any application of the doctrine of bona fide perception and consumption.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. One cannot help feeling, as objections of this kind present themselves, that cases of hardship frequently arise from the long interval of time that elapses between the granting of interim and final decreets of locality, and the omission, it may be, on the part of the heritor who is underpaying, to keep that in view and provide funds for liabilities—cases in which, as we find here, the interest on the over-payments almost three times the amount of the principal sum itself. At the same time, it is not to be forgotten that the remedy against such evils lies in the hands of the heritors themselves; for the parties who are interested in such questions, or those who represent them in the profession, have the means of avoiding the evils by making steps to have the final locality adjusted on its proper basis and according to the true legal rights of the parties without undue delay. It is well that, the rule being fixed, the profession should see that this is the only way by which wardships of this kind can be avoided, and that the remedy is within their own power.

No. 174.
July 18, 1877.
Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Campbell's
Trustees, et al.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare, in answer to the first question, that the second parties are bound to reimburse the first parties the sum of stipend overpaid by the predecessor of the first parties and unpaid by the second parties during the period between 1808 and 1825; and, in answer to the second question, that the third party is bound to reimburse the first parties the sum of stipend overpaid by the predecessor of the first parties and unpaid by the third party during the period between 1825 and 1833, and decern: Find the first parties entitled to expenses."

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM BURRELL, Petitioner.—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.
SIMPSON AND COMPANY, Respondents and Claimants.—Trayner—Jameson.

No. 175.

July 19, 1877.
Burrell v.
Simpson & Co.

THOMAS THOMSON AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Asher—Alison.
DAVID LEITH AND OTHERS, Claimants.—M'Kechie.

Process—Expenses—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 514—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63), sec. 54.—A petitioner for limitation of liability under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, having been found liable to the claimants in expenses, held (1) that several claimants having the same interest and ground of claim should not be allowed the expense of separate sittings or appearances; (2) that claimants whose claims are unopposed should be allowed only the expense of preparing and lodging their claims, and of one appearance by counsel to take decree.

SEE supra, p. 177.

In this petition by Burrell, a shipowner, for limitation of his liability for damage caused by a collision, under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, the Court found the petitioner liable to the claimants in the expenses of process.

The claimants were numerous, and separate accounts of expenses were lodged for several owners of cargo separately, for the underwriters, for the insurers, and for the master; but the petitioner maintained that only a single claim for each class of claimants should have been lodged.¹ The Auditor in his report brought this point under the notice of the Court.²

1ST DIVISION.
B.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The object of these reports is to obtain from the Court a general rule for the guidance of the Auditor. I sympathise with the observation made upon section 514 of the Act, that it was contemplated that where there were a variety of claimants against the owner of a delinquent ship that their claims should all be heard together as in a multipointing. For that purpose all the parties are brought into Court by the petition, and the money is ¹ Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. v. Arthur, &c., Feb. 24, 1858, 20 D. 7, 30 Scot. Jur. 344.

² The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 514, provides that the proceedings are to be subject to such regulations as to payment of costs as the Court thinks just.

No. 175. consigned. One object of the procedure is to save expense. But if we were to sanction what is contended for by some of the parties that object would be defeated. It is necessary to lay down some general rule for the guidance of the Auditor, and our aim must be to diminish expense without unreasonable denial of costs truly and properly incurred.

In one suggestion of the Auditor I concur,—that when claimants all belong to the same class, as, for instance, owners of cargo, their claims ought all to be in one paper, and they ought to be represented by the same counsel and agent. Where all are in the same position as regards their interest and ground of claim there ought to be no separate expenses to individuals.

There is another matter on which the Auditor has not reported or made any suggestion,—what expenses are to be allowed to claimants whose claims are unopposed? That matter may fall to be regulated hereafter more precisely. But it is clear, to this extent, that they are all entitled, first, to the cost of preparing and lodging their claims; and, secondly, to one appearance by counsel and agent to take decree.

Then there is still one other question with regard to the mariners, whether the master should not have joined with the mariners in their claim. I can see no reason why he should not. It can hardly be said that it would have been inconsistent with his dignity, and I know of no other reason.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. As to the mariners, it is perhaps right to say that they put in a note after the master's claim had been lodged, they having been on a voyage, and knowing nothing about the proceedings.

LORD PRESIDENT.—That may be; but it occurs to me that the master might have embraced their claim in his.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in the general rule, and I think it should be applied in the present case.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Of new remit the accounts of expenses to the Auditor, with the following instructions—(1) That where several claimants have the same interest and ground of claim they ought all to concur in lodging one claim, and appear by the same counsel and agents, and cannot be allowed any expenses for separate claims or appearances; (2) that claimants whose claims are unopposed are to be allowed only the expense of preparing and lodging their claims, and of one appearance by counsel to take decree."

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—SCOTT MONCRIEFF & WOOD, W.S.—FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 176.

JOHN M'ARTHUR, Pursuer.—Guthrie Smith.

JOHN LAWSON, Defender.—Fraser.

July 19, 1877.
M'Arthur v.
Lawson.

Contract—Reparation—Relevancy.—The pursuer of an action of damages for breach of contract set forth a letter of employment, which, after an obligation by the defender to pay the pursuer a certain salary for the first two years, proceeded—"At the expiry of the second year I engage to give you a substantial interest by way of partnership in my business, so that your annual income may be considerably increased." The pursuer averred that at the end of the two years the defender refused to implement the remainder of the contract

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Craighill, diss. Lord Shand) that the action was irrelevant, in respect that there were in the letter no termini habiles out of which a contract of copartnery could have been formed. No. 176.

Observed (per Lord President)—A contract which cannot be enforced by specific implement, in so far as regards its form and substance, is no contract at all, and cannot form the ground of an action of damages.

July 19, 1877.
M'Arthur v.
Lawson.

THIS was an action of damages by John M'Arthur against John Lawson, metal merchant, Glasgow. The pursuer averred as follows:—He entered into the defender's service in 1875, under the following written agreement—"Glasgow, 12th Ap. 1875. Mr John M'Arthur. Dear Sir, —I hereby engage you to take the sole management under me of my business as a metal merchant. The engagement to be for two years from this date. The salary for the first year to be £180, and for the second year £210. At the expiry of the second year I engage to give you a substantial interest by way of partnership in my business, so that your annual income may be considerably increased.—I am, yours truly, JOHN LAWSON." "Glasgow, 13th January 1876. The above arrangement is now and hereby confirmed.—JOHN LAWSON." "Glasgow, 12th April 1875. John Lawson, Esq. I accept of the above engagement on the terms stated. JOHN M'ARTHUR. JOHN LAWSON."

1st Division.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

At the end of the two years' engagement the pursuer required the defender to give him a substantial interest in the business, in terms of the agreement, but the defender refused to do so. The pursuer averred that at that time the business was yielding a clear profit of £2800. The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The writings founded on by the pursuer do not contain any termini habiles out of which a contract of copartnery could have been formed, and there having been no binding agreement upon either pursuer or defender to enter into such a contract the present action of damages for alleged breach of contract is untenable.

The Lord Ordinary repelled these two pleas, and ordered a proof.

The defender reclaimed.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong in repelling the first two pleas for the defender. The writing on which the action is founded is a contract of employment, by which the defender engaged the pursuer to take the sole management of his business as a metal merchant. The engagement was for two years, the salary for the first year being £180, and for the second year £210. Now, that contract is quite complete in all its parts. The nature of the engagement and its endurance, the duties, and the remuneration, are all specified. But then, it is added, "at the expiry of the second year I engage to give you a substantial interest by way of partnership in my business, so that your annual income may be considerably increased." It is impossible to read that clause without seeing that it is a promise or expectation which is liable to be frustrated in many events. It is liable to a great many contingencies. If the business did not continue to prosper is it to be supposed that the manager was sound, nevertheless, to go into a sinking concern? Or, if the business continued out with diminished profits, so that nothing short of the whole or more than ¹ Defender's Authorities.—Goldston v. Young, Dec. 8, 1868, 7 Macph. 188, 41 Scot. Jur. 122; Sproul v. Wilson and Wallace, Jan. 24, 1809, Hume's Dec. 920; Lindley on Partnership, i. 89; Figs v. Cutler, 1822, 3 Starkie, 139.

Pursuer's Authorities.—Lindley on Partnership, i. 991; M'Neill v. Reid, June 1, 1832, 9 Bingham, 68.

No. 176. the half of the profits would give the pursuer a substantial increase on his income, does it mean that the defender must sink into a partner to the extent of perhaps one-fourth of the profits of his own business?

July 19, 1877. M'Arthur v. Lawson.

In short, we have no means of making out the termini of a contract of copartnery. There is no endurance specified; no declaration of what the shares are to be. None of the essentials of such a contract are settled in this short sentence. If any man of business were set down to prepare a contract of copartnery from these materials he would decline the employment, because the task would be impossible. The undertaking resolves into a vague and indefinite promise of a kind which, I take it, is by no means uncommon, but which cannot, in my opinion, be enforced as a contract.

It is not contended by the pursuer that the contract can be enforced to the effect of obtaining specific implement. But he does not see that that concession is destructive of his case. A contract which cannot be enforced by specific implement, in so far as regards its form and substance, is no contract at all, and cannot form the ground of an action of damages. There are cases of contracts which give ground for actions of damages, though not of implement, but that is not from defect of form but from considerations outside of the written instrument. For example, the Court will not decree implement of a contract which the party cannot possibly perform, because that would be to condemn the party to perpetual imprisonment—"Loco facti imprestabilis subest damnum et interesse." There are other cases. An engagement to marry or to enter into a partnership will not be enforced, not because of defect in the termini of the contract, but because it would be inequitable or contrary to policy to enforce specific implement. But a contract, in order to found an action, must be complete, and as much so to found an action of damages as an action of specific implement. This is confessedly not a complete contract, and therefore it is no contract at all.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. In order to found an action of damages for breach of contract there must be a contract. There are some contracts, such, for instance, as a contract of marriage, of which, for reasons of policy, the law will not enforce specific implement, and which will nevertheless found an action of damages. But these are exceptional, and even in such cases there must be a contract.

Now, the objection to an action of damages, on this document, is that there is not only no contract of copartnery, but there are no particulars agreed on which could possibly enable the Court to say what ought to be the terms of such a contract. If the action of damages were to go on, on what footing could damages be given? We had a similar point the other day in the case of the Waverley Hydropathic Company.¹ A sale on conditions to be afterwards agreed on was held to be no sale.

There have, indeed, been special cases in which a party who had induced another to expend money on the faith that an informal transaction between them was to be carried out in due and legal form, such as the granting of a lease, or a disposition in terms substantially arranged, and who afterwards fraudulently or in bad faith refused so to bind himself as to be liable in specific implement, has been found liable to recoup the other in the specific expenditure and loss thus occasioned to him. We had occasion to review the cases which have occurred of that kind and the principle involved in them in the recent case of Allan v.

¹ Heiton v Waverley Hydropathic Co., June 6, 1877, supra, p. 830.

Gilchrist, March 10, 1875,¹ to which it is sufficient to refer. Cases of that limited class, for reimbursement of specific loss, depend upon a different principle altogether from cases like this, which is an action for general damages for alleged breach of contract where there is really no contract, nor any materials for framing a contract.

No. 176.
July 19, 1877.
M'Arthur v.
Lawson.

LORD MURE.—I concur in thinking that there is here no contract or agreement which admits of being enforced as a contract of copartnery. There is no specification of the share the pursuer was to have, or of the time for which the partnership was to endure. I was at first struck by the observation that the pursuer had entered into possession, as it were, by continuing in the defender's employment on the faith of the agreement, and if he had done so, and if the obligation at the end of the letter of 12th April 1875 had been so framed as to afford materials for framing a contract of copartnery possession for a certain time would probably have entitled the pursuer to enforcement. But there are no such materials.

We were referred to English authorities, and particularly the case of M'Neill (June 1832, 9 Bing. p. 68) for the doctrine that though a contract cannot be enforced there may be damages for breach of it. I agree, however, with your Lordships in the general proposition that when a contract cannot be enforced it cannot in the ordinary case be made the foundation for a claim of damages. And as I read that English case it is not an authority against that rule, for there was there an averment of specific loss. The plaintiff was captain of an East Indiaman, and gave up his employment on the faith of the agreement, so that the case falls within the principle of the rule applied in Walker v. Milne, 10th June 1823, 2 S. 361, and Bell v. Bell, July 9, 1841, 3 D. 1201, in both of which there was specific loss, for which it was held competent to insist, although the agreement did not admit of being enforced. In this case of M'Neill, moreover, there was an obligation to give a fixed share, namely, a fourth of the profits. Here we have nothing to bring the present case up to that; and I do not think that anything is stated in the record which can be properly sent to a jury to dispose of.

LORD SHAND.—I am unable to concur with your Lordships. I think the Lord Ordinary has rightly repelled the first and second pleas for the defender and allowed inquiry for the purpose of assessing damages, of course leaving it open to the defender to prove his averment of justifiable cause for the alleged breach.

The nature of the agreement was plainly this: The pursuer agreed to enter into the defender's service at a certain salary for one year, with an advance the second year. But the salary is only part of the consideration. Probably the most material consideration—the most material pecuniary consideration—is that part of the agreement in which the defender gives the pursuer an absolute undertaking to give him a substantial interest as a partner. I cannot regard that clause as merely holding out a hope or expectation. The well-known language of obligation is used. It may be that the Court unfortunately cannot tie down the defender to any obligation, because the deed is too loosely expressed. But it is clear that the undertaking was given as an obligation, and I think it must be taken to have been the leading consideration which induced the pursuer to enter into the contract. This being so, the pursuer suffers in-

¹ Ante, vol. ii. p. 587.

No. 176. justice if he has given his service for two years at a low remuneration, and is now to find that the remaining stipulations are not binding.

July 19, 1877.
M'Arthur v.
Lawson.

I agree in thinking that the Court could not enforce specific implement of this contract, but I do not agree that this is because of any imperfection in the terms of the contract. It was conceded that specific implement could not be enforced. But I did not understand that the concession was made on any other ground than that this was one of a class of contracts which the Court will not enforce in that way. The law will not compel parties to enter upon, or in some cases to keep up, a close and intimate relation against their will, but will give damages for breach of contract. The most common example is an engagement to marry, and the contract of service is another. So also in partnership. The law will not compel specific implement where the copartnership has not begun, but damages will be given in lieu of implement.

So the only question that remains is whether we are unable to find enough in this document to sustain it as the ground of an action for breach of contract, and I think the leaning of the Court ought to be to give the pursuer that justice which the defender by force of his pleading refuses. Now, it is said the clause is too vague, as not expressing the period of commencement, the amount of interest, or the endurance of the partnership. As to the commencement it is clear that it was provided to be at the expiry of the second year. As to the endurance, it must be taken to have been at least a year, and on the other hand the pursuer probably cannot demand more. As to the interest, it is true there is a certain vagueness. But terms are used which would enable the Court to fix what it might be. We have the salary £180, increasing to £210. Then the defender is to get a substantial interest, so that the return to him will be a considerable increase on his income. There is thus to be a considerable increase on £210, and assuming that the pursuer can shew that the business had been yielding the profit he alleges I think there are materials for fixing the interest at such a rate as would produce certainly £300 to £400, and that the sum may be fixed on the ordinary principles on which damages are assessed. Suppose such an interest would be equal to, say, a tenth share, and that it had been expressed in that way as a tenth share, that would bring the present case directly under the authority of the case of M'Neill, and that is substantially the way in which I construe this document.

It was said, suppose the business had gone wrong during the years of service would the pursuer be bound to enter a losing concern and proceed with the contract? I reply certainly not, because the stipulation was his privilege.

The English case of Figes is plainly inapplicable, because there, though there was some agreement, it did not appear what its terms were. Chief-Justice Abbott was of opinion "that the action was not maintainable in the absence of evidence to shew the terms upon which the parties had agreed to become partners, and said that he had never known any instance in which such an action had been supported without proof of the terms." The Court had no materials from which to spell out a contract. In the case of M'Neill, decided on the high authority of Chief-Justice Tindal, there was a clause similar to the present. The only difference was that while here the interest is expressed as a substantial increase on £210, there it was fixed at one-fourth. But, for the reasons I have explained, I do not think that difference material. In my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and the case ought to be allowed to proceed to proof.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Recall the said interlocutor: No. 176.
Sustain the first and second pleas in law for the defender:
Assoilzie the defender, and decern," &c.

July 19, 1877.
M^r Arthur v.
Lawson.

MACRAE & FLETT, W.S.—R. P. STEVENSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

FLORENCE MUIRHEAD, Appellant.—Fraser—Rhind.

No. 177.

JOHN MILLER (Lewis Muirhead's Trustee), Respondent.—Gloag.

July 19, 1877.
Muirhead v.
Miller.

Husband and Wife—Alimentary Provision—Arrears.—By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband bound himself to pay his wife an annuity of £100 during her life, which was declared to be alimentary. The wife lived for some years in family with her husband, who then became bankrupt. Held that the wife was not entitled to claim as a creditor for arrears of the annuity, the existence of alimentary debts not being alleged.

IN the sequestration of Lewis Muirhead, jeweller, Glasgow, his wife lodged a claim for £475, payable to her under an antenuptial marriage-^{1ST DIVISION.} contract, whereby the bankrupt bound himself to make payment to her, during her life, "exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of the said first party, and of any other husband she may marry, of a free yearly annuity of £100 sterling, declaring that as the provisions under these presents are purely alimentary they shall not be to any extent assignable or arrestable," &c. ^{Ld. Curriehill.}

The trustee rejected the claim, "in respect the instalments of annuity and interest claimed are satisfied and extinguished by the maintenance and alimentary payments which the claimant has received since her marriage from her husband."

Mrs Muirhead appealed to the Sheriff, and averred ;—" In fact, the claimant has not received aliment from the bankrupt to the extent of this annuity. Her weekly allowance was about £3 per week for the maintenance of the house, consisting of herself, her husband, two servants, and in succession one, two, and three children. She was supplied with dress, &c. partly by her own small means and partly by her relatives, to the extent of more than £70 a-year."

She pleaded ;—(2) The obligation is not extinguished by the bankrupt supplying his wife with aliment, because the annuity is not for this purpose ; he is bound at common law to maintain her, and this provision as an obligation is over and above the common law obligation, and because she is entitled to the disposal of the annuity as she pleases, for all the ordinary purposes of a woman.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) refused the appeal.*

This deliverance was affirmed on appeal by the Lord Ordinary.

The appellant reclaimed, and argued ;—This provision was something different from the ordinary obligation to support a wife.¹

Argued for the respondent ;—This was a contract which could only be enforced if the wife was not otherwise alimented. The sum was expended

* "NOTE.— I observe it is pleaded that this annuity is in no way alimentary. This I cannot hold under the clause in the marriage-contract, declaring that the provisions thereunder are purely alimentary. I am of opinion that the trustee, in holding that this provision has been extinguished by the aliment and maintenance afforded by the bankrupt to his wife up to the date of sequestration has arrived at a sound conclusion."

¹ Buie v. Gordon, Feb. 23, 1827, 5 S. 437 (N. E.), July 9, 1831, 9 S. 923 ; Rennie v. Ritchie, April 25, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 221, Lord Campbell's opinion, p. 242.

No. 177. for family purposes with the wife's consent. There was no claim for arrears of alimentary allowances except for alimentary debt.¹

July 19, 1877.
Muirhead v.
Miller.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the ground of judgment adopted by the Sheriff substitute is quite sound. This provision in a marriage-contract is certainly not of an ordinary kind. But I cannot doubt that on the face of the contract it is declared to be alimentary, and that in a question between the lady and her husband's creditors it must have been treated as alimentary if it had been paid yearly, and truly for the purpose of aliment. But when such a provision falls into arrears the presumption is that the requisite aliment is afforded otherwise, and that the claim is satisfied. And when a lady claims arrears of an alimentary annuity, the arrears when they come into her hands must be applied to alimentary purposes of the past, because the annuity goes on. Now, alimentary purposes of the past are the satisfaction of alimentary debts, and as the wife has been alimented in the past, and no alimentary debts are said to be outstanding, I do not see, if the wife got the money, what she could do with it consistently with the marriage-contract.

LORD DEAS.—I do not differ from your Lordship's ground of judgment. Or rather I concur with it so far as it goes. But I do not wish to be held as lying down that if the aliment had been demanded by the wife termly she would not have been entitled to it. That might depend on circumstances. If the husband was able to maintain the family from his own funds, she would, in my opinion, have been entitled to it, but not if he was unable to do so. The fact that it was not demanded in the present case goes to shew not only that it was not required for the purpose of aliment, but also that the wife refrained from asking it on the footing that she was to have no claim for arrears.

LORD MURE.—When a provision in a marriage-contract is declared to be alimentary it must, I think, be held to be subject to the ordinary rule of alimentary provisions. And the decision in the case of Donald, 26th May 1860, shews that arrears of aliment are not actionable, unless perhaps where debt has been incurred on the faith of the aliment.

LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 178.

July 20, 1877.
Graham, &c. v.
Edinburgh
Theatre Co.

ROBERT GRAHAM and OTHERS, Petitioners.—Mackintosh.
THE LIQUIDATOR OF THE EDINBURGH THEATRE COMPANY, Respondent.—Pearson.

Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867—Winding up—Expenses.—The expenses of a second petition for winding up a company pending the first, will, in general, not be allowed.

Circumstances in which they were allowed, the petitioners being under a reasonable apprehension that the first petition might be withdrawn.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

MOXON AND SON and others, creditors of the Edinburgh Theatre, Winter Garden, and Aquarium Company to the extent of £300, presented a petition on 5th April for winding up the company on the ground of insolvency.

¹ Dunlop's Trustee v. Dunlop, March 24, 1865, 3 Macph. 758, 37 Scot. Jur. 390; Donald v. Donald, May 26, 1860, 22 D. 1118, 32 Scot. Jur. 496.

They suggested that the secretary of the company should be appointed liquidator. A meeting of creditors to a much larger amount was then held, and they proposed that other creditors should be sisted as parties to Moxon's petition, and that the name of the secretary should be withdrawn. This proposal was not acceded to, and Robert Graham and others, representing a majority in number and value of the creditors presented a second petition for winding up on 11th April, and praying that the wishes of the creditors might be ascertained with regard to the name of the liquidator.

The Court appointed a liquidator who was not the secretary.

Graham and others then applied for the expenses of their petition.

The motion was opposed by the liquidator, who maintained that the second petition was unnecessary, and that they were only entitled to the expense of an appearance to oppose the appointment of the secretary.

Graham and others stated that they were apprehensive that the first petition would be withdrawn.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I should regret if the expenses of more than one petition in a winding up were allowed as a general rule. But there may be circumstances which justify a second application. Moxon's petition represented only a small liability. That would not be sufficient in itself to justify a second petition. But then there was a meeting of creditors to a large amount, from which a proposal came that some other creditors should be sisted in the original petition, and that the name of the secretary of the company as liquidator should be withdrawn. The latter point might only have justified an appearance as in the Highland Peat Fuel Company.¹ But the proposal to sist some of the other creditors was declined for no good reason, and there was some reasonable apprehension that the first application might be withdrawn.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES FORBES, Pursuer and Respondent.—Brand.

No. 179.

JAMES CAIRD, Respondent and Appellant.—Asher—Mackintosh.

July 20, 1877.

Proof—Innominate Contract.—The proof of an innominate contract is not restricted to writ or oath unless the stipulations are of an unusual and extraordinary character.

In defence to an action for payment of an account for stabling horses for an omnibus for several years the defender alleged that the pursuer had agreed to stable the horses free of charge in consideration of the omnibus departing from and arriving at the stabler's inn on its way to and from a railway station. Held that the contract alleged might be proved prout de jure.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court of Banff by James Forbes, innkeeper and stabler, Portsoy, against James Caird, innkeeper, Cullen, for payment of £98 due to the pursuer for stabling the defender's horses from May 1867 to October 1876. It was admitted, with regard to the whole period except the first year, that the defender ran an omnibus daily from Cullen to Portsoy and back, and that the horses were stabled at the pursuer's inn. But the defender averred that it was stipulated from the first that he was to get stable accommodation free of charge in consideration of the omnibus going to the pursuer's inn after calling at the railway

¹ Hume v. Directors of Highland Peat Fuel Co., June 27, 1876, ante, vol. ii. 881.

No. 178.
July 20, 1877.
Graham, &c. v.
Edinburgh
Theatre Co.

Forbes v.
Caird.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Banffshire.
M.

No. 179. station at Portsoy, and starting from his inn before calling at the railway station on the return journey.

July 20, 1877.
Forbes v.
Caird.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof to both parties and to each a conjunct probation.

The Sheriff adhered, "with the following addition, viz., that the proof of the agreement alleged by the defender is restricted to writ or oath."¹

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—In the cases referred to by the Sheriff the agreements were all of a very unusual character. There was no rule that innominate contracts could not be proved prout de jure. It was only in cases of contract of an extraordinary character that proof was limited to writ or oath.²

The pursuer argued that an innominate contract could only be proved by writ or oath.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no legal difficulty in this case at all. I am very unwilling to go back on that not very well fixed and somewhat abstruse doctrine about the difficulty of enforcing innominate contracts. It is not easy to reconcile all the dicta. But, going back to the passage in Erskine I do not find anything at all applicable to this case.

The claim goes back for nine or ten years. The pursuer is the proprietor of a hotel, and the defender is an omnibus proprietor. The pursuer says, You are to pay me the ordinary rates for stabling your horses. The defender says No, the consideration was the advantage given to your hotel over the rival hotel by running the omnibus to and from it. That is one of the most simple and everyday contracts, and just a case for a proof at large. The case contemplated by Erskine was a contract in which the material stipulations are not of a usual kind, and do not flow naturally from the contract. When the contract is innominate and the stipulations unusual, it is not desirable to allow a proof at large because of the lubricity of testimony in such cases.

LORD DEAS.—There is no such rule as that no innominate contract can be proved except by writ or oath. But it may be stated to be a rule that a contract of an unusual or anomalous nature can be proved only by writ or oath. For instance, it is so unusual and out of the ordinary course of business for a law agent to work for nothing that a contract to do so will only be allowed to be proved by his writ or oath. But I see nothing to come up to a case of that kind here. It was an important object for the pursuer to have the passengers by the coach brought as customers to his hotel, and there was nothing remarkable or anomalous in the arrangement averred by the defender to have been made. The first thing to have been done was to require the pursuer to prove his case. He could not have done so without proving the facts and circumstances connected with it, and it follows that the other party must then naturally have been allowed to do the same.

The fact that this arrangement went on so long without any charge being made on it is an important element as shewing the understanding between the parties, and the question is really one on the whole facts averred.

¹ The Sheriff referred to Ersk. Inst. 4, 2, 20; Johnston v. Goodlet, July 1868, 6 Macph. 1067, 40 Scot. Jur. 612; Edmonston v. Edmonston, June 1861, 23 D. 995, 33 Scot. Jur. 514, Taylor v. Forbes, Jan. 13, 1853, 24 D. 19.

² Thomson v. Fraser, Oct. 30, 1868, 7 Macph. 39, 41 Scot. Jur. 28.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

No. 179.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of date 12th May 1877, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof allowed by the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of date 14th March 1877: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in this Court," &c.

Forbes v.
Caird.

THOS. CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

EXCHEQUER CASE *

(14 & 15 VICT. c. 36, 48 GEO. III. c. 55).

WILLIAM RUSSELL.

No. 180.

Inhabited House Duty—Dwelling-house and business premises under one roof, but without internal communication between them, liable as one house. Mar. 6, 1877.
Russell.

—Mr William Russell, draper, Leslie, was assessed for inhabited house duties for the year ending 24th May 1877, at 6d. per £1 on £52, the annual value of premises occupied by him at Leslie. EXCHEQUER.
Ld. Curriehill.

Against that assessment he appealed at a meeting of the commissioners held at Kirkcaldy. Case 22.

The appellant stated that the amount on which the assessment is laid consists of £35 rent of shop and £17 rent of dwelling-house, and there being no internal communication whatever, and the house being under £20, no duty was payable. The house was entered by a roofed staircase of eighteen steps, built within the yard after referred to, but outside all the other premises. The dwelling-house was let some years ago as such, separately from the other premises, and there had been no structural alteration since. The nearest shop door was nine feet in the open air from the foot of the covered staircase. None of Mr Russell's workers boarded or lodged on either of the premises.

The surveyor stated that he had viewed the premises, which consisted of a shop on the ground-floor and house above, with yard and offices behind. The entrance to the house was from the yard, to which access was had by a "close" between this and the adjoining property, but the shop had two back doors entering upon same yard, so that the appellant went from shop to house without coming into the street or the "close." In support of the assessment the surveyor referred to rule 3, schedule B, 3 Geo. III. c. 55, which enacts that "all shops and warehouses which are attached to the dwelling-house or have any communication therewith shall in charging the said duties be valued together with the dwelling-house," and to the case decided by the English Judges, No. 2781, and intended that as the house and shop were under one roof, and as the whole premises are in the occupation of the appellant, and there was communication throughout by the private yard, which was a portion of the premises, the appellant was liable to the assessment appealed against. The Commissioners considering the question as being attended with

* From Reports of Exchequer Cases in Great Britain, relating to Income-tax and Inhabited House Duties, printed for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

No. 180. difficulty decided to relieve the appellant, with which decision the surveyor expressed himself dissatisfied, and requested that this case might be stated for the opinion of the Court.

Mar. 6, 1877.
Russell.

The Lord Ordinary (Curriehill) pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong."*

CASES ON APPEALS UNDER THE LANDS VALUATION ACTS
(17 & 18 VICT., c. 91, 20 & 21 VICT., c. 58, 30 & 31 VICT. c. 80, sec. 5).

For previous cases see 11 Macph. p. 976, et seq.

No. 181.

DUNCAN M'GREGOR AND OTHERS, Appellants.
SIR ROBERT MENZIES.

June 3, 1874.
M'Gregor, &c.
v. Menzies.

Lord Mure.
Lord Gifford.

Case 105.†

Overvaluation—Objections by third parties not on valuation-roll.—Certain villagers in Aberfeldy whose names were not on the valuation-roll appealed against the entry in the roll of Joseph Ewing, Sir Robert Menzies' gardener, as tenant of a house at a rent of £14. They produced witnesses to prove that the value was under this sum, and also, that while the gardener's wages were formerly £50, with a free house, they were now £64, £14 being retained by Sir Robert for the rent, the rent being fixed in order to give the gardener a vote. The house was within Castle Menzies grounds. Sir Robert and Ewing produced a lease for a year, and thereafter until either party gave six months' written notice, at the rent of £14, and adduced two witnesses who valued the subjects at £16.

The Commissioners repelled the objection to the locus standi of the complainers, and, by a majority, sustained the complaint, and fixed the annual value at £10. Held that the Commissioners were right.‡

No. 182.

TOWN OF INVERNESS.

June 3, 1874.
Town of Inverness.

Lord Mure.
Lord Gifford.

Case 110.

Rent of market dues—Value of area of market.—The right of levying the market dues of the town of Inverness is let to a tenant for the sum of £134, and this sum was entered in the roll, and under the head "description of subject" the entry was "shop, stalls," &c. The shops and stalls are let by the year, and are separately entered. The town chamberlain appealed, and maintained that market dues were more of the nature of customs than rent ; all that could be entered was a fair estimated value of the area of the market, which he stated at £40. No. 182.

* "NOTE.—The business premises are under the same roof as the dwelling-house and are undoubtedly attached thereto, although there is no internal communication between them, and as both are occupied by the same person they must be valued in cumulo under the statute."

† These cases are quoted from the Abstract printed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Cases of no general interest have been omitted.

‡ NOTE.—The Judges are of opinion that the lease in this case is not such a lease as is conclusive of value under the 6th section of the statute; and, upon the evidence, they see no sufficient reason for differing from the result which the Commissioners have arrived at.

The Commissioners, being of opinion that £40 was a fair estimate of the annual value of the area of the market, so far as not separately let by the year, ordered the entry to be altered to 'area of market, £40.' Held that the Commissioners were wrong. June 3, 1874.
Town of Inverness.

COLONEL D. C. R. C. BUCHANAN.

No. 183.

Lease—Rent—Fair annual value—Sub-letting—Whether rent paid by principal tenant or sub-tenant should be entered.—Colonel Buchanan let workmen's houses to Dr Adam for ten years at the rent of £265. Dr Adam sub-let them to 110 tenants, and the assessor inserted in the roll the names of the sub-tenants and their rents where the rent was £4 and upwards, and the total of the rents without names where the sub-tenants paid less than £4,—the whole amounting, in cumulo, to £475, 8s. June 3, 1874.
Buchanan.
Lord Mure.
Lord Gifford.

Case 111.

The appellant stated that the amount realised by Dr Adam depended on a variety of circumstances, such as the assumption that the fortnightly and monthly sub-tenants occupied the houses for the whole year. He also stated that the rent drawn included water and other taxes.

The assessor stated that Colonel Buchanan was, by the lease, to put the houses in repair, make drains, &c., to the extent of £250, and thereafter tenant was to maintain the houses and insure them against loss by fire. He therefore maintained that the rent paid by Dr Adam was not the fair annual value of the subjects.

The assessor also stated that the Act authorised him to enter in the roll occupiers who are not also tenants, and the Commissioners of Supply had directed him to enter in one entry tenants who pay less than £4 yearly, and he also mentioned that the Education Act gave votes to those entered in the valuation-roll at the rent of £4 and upwards.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the actual rent conditioned to be paid by the lease should be entered, and sustained the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

THE DIRECTORS OF MURRAY'S ROYAL LUNATIC ASYLUM.

No. 184.

Lunatic Asylum supported by private mortified funds.—Murray's Royal Lunatic Asylum, Perth, formerly entered at £400, was, in 1874, raised to £800. The directors appealed, and stated that the asylum was established by private mortified funds, and should be valued on a different basis from public works, and not with reference to a full return on capital invested. The institution was only intended to be self-supporting, and not a mercantile speculation. The receipts from patients were little more than the expenditure, and the surplus was applied to the extinction of £5000 of debt on the institution. For many years there was a deficiency. The County Lunatic Asylum at Murthly, and the Poorhouse of Perth, were each valued at £200, although containing as great or greater accommodation than Murray's Asylum. May 25, 1875.
Murray's
Royal Lunatic Asylum.
Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.

Case 112.

The assessor, corroborated by Mr Blackadder, C.E., Dundee, stated that the sum was under the value put on similar institutions, and instanced the Lunatic Asylum of Dundee, valued at £1200. This asylum was not larger, and was old and condemned by the government inspector as un-

- No. 184. suitable, but the ground about it was more valuable than here. Mr Blackadder stated, but it was not admitted, that £800 would not be more than 3 per cent on the cost of the buildings.
- May 25, 1875. Murray's Royal Lunatic Asylum. The magistrates and council unanimously rejected the appeal. Held that they were right.

No. 185.

JOHN SHIELDS AND ANOTHER.

- May 25, 1875. Shields. Manufactory erected and occupied since 1869—Previously entered at £450—in 1874 entered at £1700—Value of buildings and steam power—Percentage for annual value.—The Wallace Works, Balhousie (Linen Manufactory), Perth, previously entered at £450, were, in 1874, entered at £1700. John Shields, the owner, and Messrs John Shields and Company, the occupiers, appealed, and craved the valuation to be reduced to £763. They stated that, previous to 1869, Messrs John Shields and Company, the occupiers, rented premises in Kinnoul Street, Perth, for £259, 10s. per annum. The Kinnoul Street premises accommodated 350 looms, the Wallace Works 572. At the same proportion, the rent of the Wallace Works would be £425. There were no similar works in Perthshire to compare with, but in Dunfermline, the centre of such works, the valuation was at the rate of 26s. 8d. per loom, and this included warehouse accommodation, which was wanting in the Wallace Works. The Dunfermline mode would give £762, 13s. 4d. for the Wallace Works. Messrs Laird's works in Forfar, with as many workers and looms as the Wallace Works, were valued at £773. Another work in Forfar, with 300 looms and a bleachfield in addition, was valued at £300.
- Case 113. The assessor was assisted by Mr Blackadder, C.E., Dundee, in fixing the valuation. Mr Blackadder stated that he estimated the value of the heritage at £19,350, made out by taking the estimates for the buildings, and adding 10 per cent for extras, then adding £3150, the value of the steam power, at £45 per horse-power. Taking $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on this sum, and adding the value of the ground, £42 (421 poles at 2s. per pole), the annual value, in even figures, £1700, entered in the roll, is brought out. The magistrates of Dundee, after evidence and investigation in 1866, had adopted this percentage. It was arrived at on the principle that money so invested should yield 5 per cent clear, the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent being for taxes, &c.

The magistrates and council unanimously dismissed the appeal. Held that they were wrong, and valuation reduced to £1200.*

No. 186.

SUMMERLEE IRON COMPANY.

- May 26, 1875. Summerlee Iron Co. Mineral lease not more than thirty-one years—Pitmouth buildings and engine erected by tenants—Value of them entered in roll separate from rent by mineral lease.—The appellants are tenants, under a thirty years' lease, of minerals at a rent of £2000. There is an entry of this in the valuation-roll.

Case 114. In addition, they are entered as proprietors of "pit-mouth buildings"

* NOTE.—The Judges, in arriving at £1200 as the annual value, modified the 10 per cent added to the estimates for erecting the buildings for extras, and also the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in addition to the 5 per cent for taxes, &c.—supposing that the landlord's taxes, &c., in Perth might not be so high as in Dundee.

and engine," at an annual value of £150. They appealed against this entry. No. 186.

The buildings and engine were erected by the tenants at the commencement of the lease, and are indispensable in the working of the minerals. They are held by them under the lease, and so are part of the subjects entered in the roll, and covered by the entry of the rent of £2000. May 26, 1875.
Summerlee
Iron Co.

The assessor regarded the pit-mouth buildings and engine as erected on lands held under lease for longer than twenty-one years, and so to be valued independently of the mineral lease.

The Commissioners confirmed the entry. Held that the Commissioners were wrong.

ALEXANDER MITCHELL INNES.

No. 187.

Farm—By lease landlord had power to resume land for planting— May 26, 1875.
Mitchell
Innes.
Rent of farm £3 per acre—Allowance for land resumed £5 per acre—
Rent of farm—Value of land resumed.—The farm of Ayton Mains was let for £341, 6s. 8d., being £3 per acre. By the lease the landlord was to allow £5 for each acre he might resume for planting, &c. Last year he resumed rather more than 11 acres, which have been planted and added to the woodland on the estate. £56, 16s. 8d., being £5 per acre for the land resumed, was deducted from the rent, and the balance, £284, 10s., returned to the assessor as the rent now payable, but only £24 was returned as the annual value of the land resumed. The assessor added £56, 16s. 8d. to the woodland for the land resumed. Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.
Case 115.

The landlord appealed, and contended that only £3 per acre should be added to the woodland, that being the rent at which the land in its natural state would let for.

The assessor submitted that the rent of the farm should only have been reduced by £3 per acre for the land resumed, or the full sum of £56, 16s. 8d. should be given as the value of the woodland.

The Commissioners sustained the valuation. Held that the Commissioners were wrong; that the tenant's rent should be entered in the roll at the rent actually paid, and that the land which had been resumed by the landlord should be entered as woodland at £3 per acre.

BURGH OF INVERURIE.

No. 188.

Market stance—Market customs of burgh.—By charters from Queen Mary and King James VI. the burgesses and inhabitants of the burgh of Inverurie have right to erect a market cross, and to have and hold markets on certain days, and to levy tolls, customs, duties, and liberties pertaining to free markets. The right to levy the market customs was let to George Jamieson at the yearly rent of £24. "The market stance" is entered in the roll, the magistrates as proprietors, George Jamieson as tenant, and he yearly value, £24. The treasurer of the burgh appealed. May 26, 1875.
Burgh of Inverurie.
Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.
Case 116.

The appellant stated that the full value of the stance was entered under tent, stances, and pasture, £9, 2s. 6d." The right of levying the market customs of the burgh was what was let to George Jamieson, and this was a source of income to the corporation, apart from their lands, and the customs were not pertinent of the market stance. They were levied not at the market stance, but at the burgh boundaries, upon all goods coming into the burgh for sale on market day, whether they went to the stance

- No. 188. or not. The interpretation-clause of the Lands Valuation Act explaining "lands and heritages" did not specify market customs or subjects akin to them.
 May 26, 1875. Burgh of Inverurie.
 The assessor maintained that the customs were pertinents of the burgh lands, and therefore came under the expression "lands and heritages."
 The Commissioners (the magistrates) directed the entry to be deleted.
 Held that the Commissioners were wrong.

No. 189.

MRS EMMA JERDAN.

May 25, 1876.
Jerdan.Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.

Case 118.

Rent of inn—Tenant bound to purchase her stock of ale and beer from proprietors, who are brewers.—The premises, consisting of the Yawl Inn, Eyemouth, are verbally let at a rent of £14, but the assessor entered the annual value as £20, the tenant being bound to purchase from the proprietors, who are brewers, all the beer and ales she required. She only received a discount of 4 per cent, while the usual trade discount is from 15 to 20 per cent. Her purchases amounted to about £130 yearly. The tenant appealed, and adduced evidence of tradesmen that £14 was the full value of the subjects.

The Commissioners sustained the valuation. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 190.

SIR DAVID KINLOCH.

June 1, 1876.
Kinloch.Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.

Case 119.

Rent by lease—Abatements first four years—Improvements.—The farm of Markle was let on a nineteen years' lease, at a rent of £700 in money, and the value of 280 quarters of wheat at the fairs prices. For the first four years there were to be abatements of £200, £150, £100, and £50 respectively. The lease did not state the reason of the abatements, nor that the farm was not in good condition. The assessor entered the rent at £1354, 4s., without giving effect to the abatement. The appellants, the landlord and tenant, desired the abatement to be deducted. The assessor said it was reasonable to assume, in absence of explanation in the lease, that the abatements were to be expended in improvements (having a permanent character), and were thus, to all intents and purposes, rent.

The Commissioners refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 191.

SIR THOMAS BUCHAN HEPBURN.

June 1, 1876.
Hepburn.Lord Shand.
Ld. Craighill.

Case 120.

Rent by lease—Farm not in good condition—Reduction first two years.—The farm of Gateside was let on a nineteen years' lease at £187, 17s. 6d. for the first two years of the lease, and £375, 15s. for the remaining seventeen years. It was stated that the farm was in bad order, and the rent was arranged to enable the tenant to put it in good condition. There was no stipulation in the lease as to repairs or improvements to be done by the tenant. The assessor entered the annual value at £375, 15s. in the second year. The landlord appealed, and contended that the rent should be entered at £187, 17s. 6d., as stated in the lease.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

BARONY PAROCHIAL BOARD.

No. 192.

Value—Basis of value—Accommodation or cost of erection—Lunatic Asylum.—Woodielee Lunatic Asylum for pauper lunatics of the Barony Parish, Glasgow, is situated in parish of Kirkintilloch, and is entered in the roll at £1600. The Barony Parochial Board appealed, and claimed to have it reduced to £1000. The Kirkintilloch Parochial Board claimed to have it increased to £2500.

April 2, 1877.

Barony Parochial Board.Ld. Craighill.
Ld. Curriehill.

The asylum is licenced for 400 patients, so that the valuation amounted to £4 per bed. The Barony Board contended that, as compared with other asylums and with poorhouses this valuation per bed was excessive, and referred to the valuation of Rosewell Asylum, Gartnavel Asylum, and poorhouses of Govan, &c. The inspector of Kirkintilloch stated that the valuation per bed of poorhouses did not form a criterion for the valuation of lunatic asylums, the accommodation per bed being greater in the latter. £2500 is not quite two per cent on the cost of erection, and this was a reasonable valuation, and referred in support of it to the Larbert Public Lunatic Asylum, Edinburgh Poorhouse, &c.

Case 122.

The assessor stated that, having regard to character and extent of accommodation and cost of erection, £1600 was a moderate and fair valuation.

The Commissioners confirmed. Held that the Commissioners were right.

HERITORS OF KINGOLDRUM AND HERITORS OF KIRRIEMUIR.

No. 193.

Parish Church—If all lands and heritages to be entered, or only such as can be let.—The parish churches of Kingoldrum and Kirriemuir were entered at £20 and £120 respectively. The heritors appealed. The Commissioners, having in view that section 6 of the Act provides that the value of lands and heritages is to be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, they might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to be let, and that parish churches, while such, cannot be the subject of a lease, were of opinion that parish churches do not fall fairly within the terms of the statute, and sustained the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

April 2, 1877.

Heritors of Kingoldrum and Heritors of Kirriemuir.Ld. Craighill.
Ld. Curriehill.

Case 123.

ABERDEEN CITY TREASURER AND ANOTHER.

No. 194.

Market stances—Magistrates let right to rents or dues for stands in public street of burgh on market days.—The public market in Aberdeen is held every Friday, and the space in Castle Street round the cross is occupied by hucksters with their stands and wares, and for each stand or stall, with a few exceptions, "casualty, mail, or rent" is payable to the town. The right to collect the stand rents is let to a tacksman. The assessor entered under the description "market stances" the stances for these stands, the treasurer of Aberdeen as proprietor, and the tacksman as tenant. The treasurer and tacksman appealed.

April 2, 1877.
Aberdeen City
Treasurer, &c.Ld. Craighill.
Ld. Curriehill.

Case 124.

The appellants maintained that subjects, to enter the roll, must be shown to form the actual or possible subject of a lease; there must also be a proprietor with a title to let, and a tenant possessing and paying rent. That Castle Street was the ancient highway through the burgh,

No. 194.

April 2, 1877.
Aberdeen City
Treasurer, &c.

and was different from a burgh having a field, its property, for a market stance. The treasurer was not proprietor of Castle Street, and there could be no legal private appropriation of it. The town-council formerly provided stands and charged for their use. The dealers now brought their own stands, but the fiction remained that they were using those supplied by the town-council, and paying hire for them. The tacksman maintained that the right let to him "the casualties, maills, or rents payable for stands set up at the market cross" was a moveable right, viz., the jus exigendi to collect burgh customs, and if burgh customs had been intended to be assessed they would have been entered in the interpretation-clause. The tacksman could not assign a particular stance to any person, or remove any person from Castle Street. All persons having stands did not pay rent.

The assessor stated that the sellers possessed the ground in Castle Street around the cross with their stands each market day until removed at night, and, excepting a few, all paid rent. It was not the solum of the whole of Castle Street, but the solum of each stand, which was let, and it was the ground forming the stances of the stands which he had entered. These stances formed an assessable subject, and the landlord was the town-council, and the tacksman the tenant.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 195.

LORD BLANTYRE.

April 2, 1877.
Lord Blantyre.

Ld. Craighill.
Ld. Curriehill.

Case 125.

Ferry—A ferry between two counties entered in roll of both counties.—The ferry of Erskine, on the river Clyde, is a pertinent of the barony of Erskine, situated in Renfrewshire. The Clyde, at this point, divides the counties of Renfrew and Dumbarton, and the ferry in fact extends into both counties. There is a pier or landing-place on both sides. The ferry and appurtenances, with a hotel, on Renfrewshire side, are let for £100. This year, for the first time, an entry was made of £40 as the proportion applicable to the county of Dumbarton. Lord Blantyre appealed, on the ground that the barony of which the ferry is a pertinent is situated wholly in Renfrewshire.

The Commissioners sustained the entry, but fixed the proportion of annual value applicable to Dumbartonshire at £20. Held that the Commissioners were right.*

* "NOTE.—On the assumption that the full £100, which is the actual rent of the ferry, &c., &c., has been entered as the value in the valuation-roll of Renfrewshire for the current year, we take for granted that to the extent of the £20, which has now been allocated to the county of Dumbarton, there will be an abatement from the Renfrewshire valuation."

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME IV.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
See separate Indices for Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court,
p. 1195, the Lands Valuation Appeal Court (1873-7), p. 1196, and the Court of Justiciary, p. 1197.

ADemption of LEGACY. See Succession, 5.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

An action of damages against a Sheriff, for slander alleged to have been uttered by him while sitting in judgment, held to be incompetent. Harvey v. Dyce, Dec. 23, 1876, p. 265.

AGENT AND CLIENT.

1. The law-agent employed by the trustee in a sequestration is not, as such, disqualified from purchasing the bankrupt estate. Noble v. Campbell, Nov.
4, 1876, p. 77.

Purchase by Agent.

2. W, a law-agent, bought for his brother, Dr W, four dwelling-houses from two ladies, the Misses M, as trustees of their late father. The missives of sale were signed for the sisters by H M, their brother. In answer to an action for implement brought by Dr W, the trustees brought an action of reduction of the missives, on the ground that W, though acting for the purchaser, was also the trustees' agent in and for the sale, and that while ostensibly buying for Dr W, he was in reality, unknown to them, buying in fact for himself. Held, in the circumstances (rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill, diss. Lord Shand), that the Misses M had failed to prove either
(1) that W occupied the position of general law-agent for the trust, or (2) that he was specially constituted the agent of the trustees for the sale of the particular property in question. Watt v. McPherson's Trustees, et c contra, March 2, 1877, p. 601. [Judgment reversed in H. L. Dec. 3, 1877.]

Agent's Charges.

3. Persons in prosecuting a claim to an estate obtained an advance of £2000, on granting in return a personal bond binding themselves to pay £10,000 in the event of success, and a heritable security for £10,000 over the estate.
Held that the rate of charge by the agent for preparing these deeds was to be regulated by the consideration given and not by the amount which the claimants would have to pay in the event of their establishing their right to the estate. Robertson, &c. v. Ramsay, &c., June 29, 1877, p.
960.

See Expenses, 2.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. See Fraud, 1—Proof, 2—Public Company, 1.

ALIMENT. Of Parent by Child.

A father brought an action for aliment against one of his four children. The defender pleaded that the other children should have been called. Plea repelled, on the ground that it was not supported by an allegation that the other children had a superfluity of means after providing for themselves and their families. Hamilton v. Hamilton, March 20, 1877, p. 688.

ALIMENTARY PROVISION. Husband and Wife.

1. By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband bound himself to pay his wife an annuity of £100 during her life, which was declared to be alimentary. The wife lived for some years in family with her husband, who then became bankrupt. Held that the wife was not entitled to claim as a creditor for arrears of the annuity, the existence of alimentary debts not being alleged. Muirhead v. Miller, July 19, 1877, p. 1139.

Discharge.

2. In a trust-settlement the trustees were directed to pay an annuity, which was declared to be an alimentary provision and not arrestable nor assignable by the annuitant onerously or gratuitously. After the whole purposes of the trust had been fulfilled except payment of the annuity the heir-at-law of the trustor, who was entitled to the residue of the trust-estate, called upon the trustees to denude, and proposed to grant a bond of annuity over the heritable property, which formed the residue of the trust-estate, in favour of the annuitant, in precisely the same terms as provided in the trust-deed. The annuitant was willing to accept of the security offered in place of the provision in the trust-deed, and to concur in granting a discharge to the trustees. Held that the annuitant had not power to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and that the trustees were not entitled to denude. White's Trustees v. Whyte, June 1, 1877, p. 786.

See Succession, 4—Trust, 1.

APPEAL TO HOUSE OF LORDS. Leave to Appeal.

In an action raised by a landlord for reduction of a lease of a quarry on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud, and for removal and accounting, the tenant pleaded that in the event of his lease being reduced he was entitled to retain possession of the quarry under a separate agreement with the landlord. A jury found that the landlord had been induced to grant the lease by fraud, and thereafter the Court reduced the lease and repelled the tenant's plea that he was entitled to retain possession, and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the conclusions for accounting. On the defender applying for leave to appeal it was granted, on condition that he found caution for violent profits, and that the petition of appeal was presented and an order of service obtained thereon within eight days. Gardner v. Beresford's Trustees, July 17, 1877, p. 1091.

APPEALS TO COURT OF SESSION. See Process, 12 to 17.

APPEALS TO COURT OF JUSTICIARY. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1197.

APPRENTICE. See Meditatio Fugæ.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. Jus Relictæ.

1. Held that when a mortis causa settlement disposes of the whole estate of the granter his widow is not entitled to take provisions under it and at the same time claim her legal rights. Caithness' Trustees v. Caithness, July 20, 1877, p. 937.

Implied Condition—Entailer's Debts.

2. An institute of entail held entitled to remain in possession of the entailed estate, and also to keep up as a charge against the estate a sum secured over the same to which he had acquired right, in virtue of what had been found by a previous decision to be the legal effect of a deed executed by the entailer unico contextu with the entail, although in that deed the entailer expressed his desire that the estate should be disburdened of the debt. M'Donald v. M'Donald, Nov. 1, 1876, p. 45.

ARBITRATION. See Process, 10.

ARRESTMENT. Ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

Arrestments ad fund. jur. were used by a pursuer in the hands of the trustee on the bankrupt estate of a person against whom the defenders had a contingent claim. Plea of no jurisdiction sustained, in respect that it was proved that there were no assets in the hands of the trustee. Wyper v. Carr and Co., Feb. 2, 1877, p. 444.

ASSIGNATION.

A partner of a building association, with unlimited liability, assigned to a third party a debt due to him by the company. Held, after proof, that the association was insolvent at the date of the assignment, (1) that calls or contributions leviable by the association from the cedent as a partner for payment of the debts of the association might be set off against the debt due to him by the association, and (2) that the assignee was in no better position than the cedent. Shiells v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co., Dec. 22, 1876, p. 250.

See Insurance—Personal or Transmissible.

BANK. See Fraud, 2.

BANKRUPTCY. Bankrupt's Title to Sue—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 99.

1. At a meeting of the creditors of a bankrupt called for the purpose of discharging the trustee a resolution was passed and intimated by the trustee to the bankrupt abandoning a claim to certain property. In an action by the bankrupt prosecuting the claim the preliminary plea, that as he had not been reinvested in his estates he had no title to sue, was stated for the defenders, and repelled. Fleming v. Walker's Trustees, Nov. 16, 1876, p. 112.

Election of Trustee, meeting for.

2. The hour of meeting for the election of a trustee and commissioners having been omitted per incuriam in the Gazette notice, the Court, on the petition of the bankrupt, appointed new intimation in the Gazette. Von Rotberg, Dec. 22, 1876, p. 263.
3. By the deliverance awarding sequestration, the Sheriff, per incuriam, appointed the meeting of creditors for the election of a trustee to be held on an earlier day than was consistent with the 67th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. On the petition of the bankrupts and of the concurring creditor the Court fixed another day of meeting, and appointed intimation thereof in the Gazette. Watt, Philp, and Co., March 10, 1877, p. 641.

Trustee's Law Agent.

4. An agent employed by the trustee in a sequestration became the purchaser of a decree for payment belonging to the bankrupt estate, which he assigned to a third party. The assignee having charged upon the decree, the debtor presented a note of suspension, on the ground that the sale by the trustee was null, the purchaser being the agent employed by the trustee in the sequestration. Suspension refused. Noble v. Campbell, Nov. 4, 1876, p. 77.

Estate attachable.

5. Terms of a trust-disposition which was held not to be in itself valid against creditors of the grantor, nor to be rendered so by a reference to it in an antenuptial contract executed a few days after by the grantor, followed by marriage and the birth of a son. Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, p. 22.

Heritable Creditor—Poining of the ground—19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 102 and sec. 118—37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, sec. 55.

6. In a question between the trustee in a sequestration and a creditor having a real security prior to the date of sequestration who had executed a poining of the ground after that date but before the confirmation of the trustee, held that the repeal (by the 55th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874) of section 118 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 left the right of the poining creditor to be regulated by section 102 and the common law, and that he had right to the moveables attached, his heritable right being prior to that of the trustee. Royal Bank v. Bain, July 6, 1877, p. 985.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Transaction of claims—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 115 and 176—Transaction.

7. Held that a transaction by which the trustee and commissioners in a sequestration gave up a portion of the bankrupt's heritable estate to a heritable creditor in lieu of his claims against the estate was not subject to challenge on the ground that the statutory conditions attaching to a private sale of heritage had not been complied with—the transaction being a bona fide compromise, and not a sale. Dalzell v. Denniston, &c., Dec. 12, 1876, p. 222.

Ranking—Valuation and deduction of security.

8. A, a manufacturer, shipped a cargo of goods to a foreign port, and made out the bills of lading in the name of B. He then handed the bills of lading to B and authorised him by letter to hypothecate the goods, with liability to account for any surplus realised, and in return obtained an advance for which he granted bills. B discounted the bills with a bank, handing them the bills of lading and letter of authority. The bank sent the bills of lading to a merchant at the port of delivery with instructions to realise the goods and remit the proceeds to them. When the goods were only partially realised, and the remainder was insufficient to meet the claim of the bank, A became bankrupt, and B also became insolvent. The bank having claimed to rank upon A's estate for the balance due on the bills the trustee called upon them to value and deduct the security they held in the goods unrealised, as being part of the bankrupt's property. Held, on appeal, that the bank was not bound to value and deduct the goods, as, in a question with the bank, the goods must be held to be the property of B. British Linen Co. v. Gourlay, March 13, 1877, p. 651.

Ranking—Claim of wife to rank for alimentary provision.

9. By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband bound himself to pay his wife an annuity of £100 during her life, which was declared to be alimentary. The wife lived for some years in family with her husband, who then became bankrupt. Held that the wife was not entitled to claim as a creditor for arrears of the annuity. Muirhead v. Miller, July 19, 1877, p. 1137.

Compensation.

10. Where certain bills were discounted by A, an indorsee, for value, and subsequently retired by him at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, partly with funds supplied by C, a person who had guaranteed B, a prior indorser, against loss upon the bills, held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that A, the holder of the bills, was entitled to plead compensation against them against a debt due by him to the bankrupt, and that the special objections (1) that A, the holder, was not the holder at the date of sequestration, nor the drawer, but only an intermediate indorsee, and (2) that the plea of compensation was really stated for behoof of C, the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, had been rightly repelled. Hannay and Sons' Trustees v. Armstrong Brothers and Company, March 22, 1877, H. L., p. 43.

See Expenses, 1.

BILL. Proof.

1. In a suspension of a charge at the instance of the drawer of a bill the Court allowed a proof before answer prout de jure, in respect that the charger admitted that the bill had been obtained by him in circumstances out of the ordinary course of business. Alexander v. Stuart, Jan. 27, 1877, p. 366.
2. Proof prout de jure allowed of averments that a sum had been paid in error by a bill which had been duly retired. Balfour v. Smith and Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, p. 454.

See Bankruptcy, 10.

BONA FIDES.

1. Private knowledge by purchaser of heritage of a prior right. Stodart v. Dalzell, Dec. 16, 1876, p. 236.
2. In a question of trespass. Hay's Trustees v. Young, Jan. 31, 1877, p. 398. See Personal objection—Teinds, 2.

BURGH. See Police.CARRIER. Reasonable Precautions for Safety of Public—Contributory Negligence—Carriage of Persons by Railway Companies.

Passenger run over and killed by a train while crossing from one platform to the other at a station where there was no bridge over the rails. The Court refused to disturb the verdict of a jury finding the railway company liable in damages. Thomson v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1876, p. 115.

CHARITY. See Trust, 8, 9.CHURCH. Churchyard.

1. Circumstances in which held (aff. judgment of Court of Session) that a heritor whose land had been compulsorily taken as an addition to the churchyard, was not entitled to have the proceedings set aside on the ground of want of notice. Walker v. Presbytery of Arbroath, Nov. 24, 1876, H. L., p. 1.

Allocation of Area—Excambion—Quoad Sacra Parish.

2. Where the original parish church, in a parish from which a part had been disjoined and erected into a parish quoad sacra, was excambied for a new church voluntarily erected by one of the heritors, held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that in the absence of stipulation in the contract of excambion the sittings fell to be allocated as in the old church. Duke of Roxburgh and Others v. Millar, June 29, 1877, H. L., p. 76.

Glebe.

3. Held that the 4th section of the United Parishes Act, 1876, did not apply to the case of a quoad sacra parish a small portion of which only had been disjoined from a united parish and the rest from adjoining parishes. Minister of Bridekirk v. Minister and Heritors of Hoddam, June 4, 1877, p. 798.

COLLATION INTER LIBEROS. See Parent and Child, 4.COMPANY. See Partnership—Public Company.COMPENSATION. See Bankruptcy, 10—Expenses, 2—Master and Servant, 2.CONDUCTIO INDEBITI. See Error.CONTRACT. See Proof, 3.CONTRACT, BREACH OF. See Reparation, 7, 8, 9.CONVERSION. See Succession, 3, 4.CRIME. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1197.CUSTODY OF CHILD. See Parent and Child, 2.DEAN OF GUILD. See Jurisdiction, 1.DILIGENCE. Act Abolishing Imprisonment for Civil Debts of Small Amount, 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70), sec. 1—Interest.

A person who had borrowed £10, from which 15s. was deducted by the lender as interest in advance, granted a promissory-note for the £10, and by a separate writing bound himself to repay that sum in weekly instalments of 10s., and in the event of failing for two successive weeks to pay these instalments then to pay to the lender "an additional sum of 2d. for each pound, or part of a pound, of the total amount of said bill, and that for every week's failure, till such time as" the lender proceeded to recover as otherwise provided for. Held that these additional payments were to be regarded as interest in the sense of the "Act abolishing, in Scotland, imprisonment for civil debts of small amount," 1835, which enacts, "that it shall not be lawful to imprison any person or persons on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d. sterling, exclusive of interest and expenses thereon." Shaw v. Morison, March 9, 1877, p. 637.

See Sheriff, 5.

DISCHARGE. See Alimentary Provision, 2.

DOMICILE. Indian Service.

A Scotchman entered the civil service of the East India Company in 1841, and remained in it until his death in 1875, when he was on a two years' furlough in Europe. The servants of the East India Company were transferred to the Crown in 1858 by 21 and 22 Vict., cap. 106. The Succession Act, 1865, of the Indian Council, sets forth, in an "Explanation," "A man is not to be considered as having taken up his fixed habitation in British India merely by reason of his residing there in her Majesty's civil or military service, or in the exercise of any profession or calling." Held that neither the Act of 1858 nor the Act of Council of 1865 affected the domicile the deceased had acquired before they were passed in British India, and that his domicile was there at the date of his death. Wauchope v. Wauchope, June 23, 1877, p. 945.

DONATION INTER VIRUM ET UXOREM. See Husband and Wife, 3, 4, 5.

ELECTION LAW. See Index of Registration Appeal Court Cases, p. 1195.

ENTAIL. Moveables.

1. Held, by Lord Shand (Ordinary), that an entail of moveables is ineffectual even inter heredes. Kinnear v. Kinnear, &c., March 20, 1877, p. 705.
2. Entail executed under reserved power contained in an antenuptial contract challenged on the ground that the destination was not in conformity with the power. M'Donald v. M'Donalds, Jan. 11, 1877, p. 271.
3. A testator instructed his trustees to execute a strict entail. The trustees having executed an entail which was discovered to be invalid, held that the institute was not entitled to avail himself of the mistake to the prejudice of the subsequent heirs. Ochterlony v. Ochterlony and Others, Feb. 24, 1877, p. 587.

Feuing—Power to Feu with right to Water Supply from remainder of Entailed Estate—Estates afterwards separated—Servitude aqueductus.

4. An heir of entail in possession obtained power to feu a part of the entailed estate in terms of a form of feu-charter approved by the Court, whereby the feuars were taken bound to "take and pay for," by way of annual assessment, a water supply provided from another portion of the entailed estate not within the limits of the feuing ground. The feuing ground was afterwards excambied for other lands held by the heir of entail in fee-simple, and thus became vested in the heir of entail as a fee-simple proprietor. In a question between a succeeding heir of entail and the successor in the fee-simple estate of superiority of the feus, held (1) that the feu-charters granted before the excambion had created servitudes of aqueductus over the entailed estate in return for annual payments which were due to the heir of entail in possession as owner of the servient tenement, and not to the superior of the feus; (2) the feu-charters granted after the excambion were ineffectual to create such servitude. Stewart v. Stewart, July 5, 1877, p. 981.

Improvements—27 and 28 Vict. c. 114, secs. 78 and 80.

5. In a petition presented by an heir of entail in possession, in terms of sect. 21 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, craving the Court to authorize the Inclosure Commissioners to sanction as a charge upon the estate a sum which he proposed to subscribe towards the stock of a branch railway to be made through the estate, by virtue of sections 78 and 80 of the Act, held that it was not indispensable that the petitioner should shew that the making of the railway and consequent benefit to the estate were contingent on his proposed subscription. Edmonstone, Feb. 24, 1877, p. 585.

Improvement Expenditure—11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, secs. 15 and 18.

6. Where an heir of entail in possession has made improvements on the estate prior to 1848, and constituted three-fourths of the expenditure a debt against succeeding heirs, but has died without creating over the estate a security, either by bond of annualrent for such three-fourths or by bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of such three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, held that his executors were entitled under the 15th section of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, to require the succeeding heir of entail to execute in their favour a bond of annualrent for such three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, and that the heir had not under the 18th section of the statute the option of substituting therefor a bond and disposition in security over the estate for two-thirds of such three-fourths. Nasmyth's Executors v. Nasmyth, et c contra, June 30, 1877, p. 973.

ENTAIL—Continued.

38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 12—Death of heir.

7. Section 12, sub-section 3, of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, provides for applications under the Act being carried on by personal representatives and others "according to their respective rights and interests" should the heir of entail die before decree had been obtained. Held that the object of the section was to regulate procedure only, and this provision did not of itself confer a right upon the representatives of a deceased heir of entail to be sisted in a petition at his instance to charge improvement debt. Maxwell, July 17, 1877, p. 1112.

38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 11—Express Conveyance.

8. Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord President), that a general disponee of an heir of entail is not in the position of having "expressly" conveyed to him, in the sense of the 11th section of the "Entail Amendment Act, 1875," a sum of money which the heir of entail was, before his death, in course of charging against the estate as an improvement debt. Maxwell, July 17, 1877, p. 1112.

Disentailing—Date of Entail in sense of sec. 2 of 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36.

9. By deed of entail dated prior to 1st August 1848 the entailor reserved power to alter the destination, and he executed, subsequent to 1st August a deed of alteration by which he merely struck out of the entail the series of heirs called in the second branch of the destination. Held that the entail was an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848 in the sense of section 2 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848. Blair, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 308.

Munston-House—Obligation to Rebuild.

10. An heir of entail in possession pulled down the greater part of the mansion-house, which was in good repair, and proceeded to rebuild it on a more extensive scale. Before the new house was finished or made habitable he died. In an action by a succeeding heir of entail against the executors, concluding that they were bound to complete the house according to the plans, or alternatively to make it as good as it was originally, the defenders were assoluted, on the ground that the demolition of the house, with a view to rebuilding it, having been in good faith, was a lawful act of the heir, and that no obligation to rebuild transmitted against his executors. Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, March 16, 1877, p. 667.

Obligation on Heirs and Successors to Relieve Estate of Debt.

11. The maker of a deed of entail inserted a clause, binding himself, his heirs-at-law, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve the entailed lands, and the heirs to succeed thereto, of all debts and obligations whereby they might be evicted. He afterwards purchased another estate, and entailed it on the same series of heirs as were called in the former entail, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and representatives to relieve the estate of the granter's debts, but reserving a power of revocation. At his death the estates under the first entail were burdened with certain entailor's debts. The institute under the two entails succeeded. In an action against the institute in possession of both estates, at the instance of the next heir, held that the defender was not, in respect of his having succeeded to the second estate, personally bound to relieve the first estate of the entailor's debts. M'Donald v. M'Donald, Jan. 11, 1877, p. 280.

Contravention.

12. The institute in possession of entailed estates came also to be in right of a bond secured over them containing a power of sale, which he assigned to third parties. In an action at the instance of the next heir for declarator of irritancy, on the ground that the institute had contravened a prohibition against doing any act whereby the lands might be evicted, by assigning the bond to third parties, who might sell or adjudge, held (1) that the institute was entitled to keep up the bond as a charge against the estate, and (2) that no irritancy had been incurred by assigning it to third parties.

ENTAIL—Continued.

M'Donald v. M'Donald, Jan. 11, 1877, p. 280.

See Appropriate and Reprobate, 2—Revenue, 1.

ERROR.

Averments that a contractor's account had been overpaid to the extent of £100, owing to a mistake induced by the representations of the contractor, held relevant to support a condictio indebiti, and proof proud de jure allowed, although it was pleaded that, as the payment had been made by bill (which had been retired), proof must be restricted to writ or oath. Balfour v. Smith and Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, p. 454.

See Issue.

EXCAMBION. See Church, 2—Entail, 4.

EXCISE. See Revenue, 3.

EXECUTOR. Confirmation of Mother.

1. Held that the interest conferred by the Moveable Succession Act, 1855, upon a mother in the succession of her deceased child entitled her to be confirmed executrix qua mother in the absence of others having a preferable title. Muir, Nov. 3, 1876, p. 74.

Joint appointment.

2. There is no incompetency in the confirmation of two persons as joint executors though claiming the office in different characters. Muir, Nov. 3, 1876, p. 74.
3. Held that the right to repudiate conventional provisions made by a father in favour of a married daughter, and claim legitim, did not vest ipso jure in her husband, who had died without taking any steps to assert the right and that whether he could have claimed the legitim effectually or not his executor was not entitled to claim it. Millar v. Birrell, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 87.

Heir and Executor—Public Burdens.

4. The heir in possession of entailed estates, the rents of which were postponed, died one day after the term of Whitsunday. In a question between his executrix and the succeeding heir of entail, held that the executrix was not liable for burdens effeiring to the possession after Whitsunday. Maitland v. Maitland, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 422.

Heir and Executor.

5. Held that an assessment imposed by consent of heritors on 30th June, partly to meet debts incurred prior to Whitsunday, and partly to provide for the expenditure of the year following, could not be charged against the executor of a heritor who had died at Whitsunday. Maitland v. Maitland, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 422.

EXPENSES. Caution for Expenses.

1. In an accounting arising out of joint mercantile transactions between the pursuer and defender in an action, the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment was to render the defender insolvent. He accordingly offered a caution to his creditors, which was refused, but he was not rendered notor bankrupt. In the event of the Lord Ordinary's judgment being reversed the defender was admittedly solvent. On his presenting a reclaiming note, held that the circumstances were not such as to entitle the pursuer to caution for expenses. Weir v. Buchanan, Oct. 18, 1876, p. 8.

Agent disburser—Compensation.

2. Where the respondent in a petition had obtained an award of expenses against the petitioners, the Court refused to allow the decree to go out in name of the agent disburser, on the ground that in another litigation between the parties relating to the same subject-matter, disposed of at the same time, the petitioners had obtained a decree for expenses against the respondent, which they were entitled to set off against the respondent's account. Portobello Pier Co. v. Clift, March 16, 1877, p. 685.

EXPENSES—Continued.

3. A wife who had obtained decree of separation and aliment against her husband, held entitled to recover from her husband all reasonable and proper expenses incurred by her in carrying into execution the orders and interlocutors of the Court regarding the children of the marriage, including a warrant for interim execution pending appeal to the House of Lords. Symington, &c., v. Symington, July 6, 1877, p. 993.

Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 514

—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63), sec. 54.

4. A petitioner for limitation of liability under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, having been found liable to the claimants in expenses, held (1) that several claimants having the same interest and ground of claim should not be allowed the expense of separate claims or appearances; (2) that claimants whose claims are unopposed should be allowed only the expense of preparing and lodging their claims, and of one appearance by counsel to take decree. Burrell v. Simpson and Company, July 19, 1877, p. 1133.

See Process, 18.

FEE AND LIFERENT.

1. Terms of a provision in favour of daughters in liferent, and their children nascituri in fee, held to confer a right of liferent only on the daughters. Dawson, &c., Feb. 24, 1877, decided Nov. 10, 1876, p. 597.

Mineral Lease.

2. A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the free annual income of the residue of his estate, and after her death to invest the residue in the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed on a series of heirs. At his death the testator left property worth about £220,000. He also held two mineral leases which had then five years to run. The trustees carried on the mines, and in three years realised £30,000 of profit. The widow having claimed this sum, held that it was not free annual income, but part of the residue. Ferguson v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 532.

Protected Succession.

3. A testator directed his trustees to retain the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, till his only child, a daughter, should be married and a child born of the marriage, and upon a child being born to convey "to her and to the child or children of the marriage, or of any subsequent marriage, . . . equally among them, if she shall not otherwise appoint, but subject always to a power of division by her," and failing children of his daughter, then to the truster's nearest heirs and assignees, and he declared and directed that neither the annual proceeds nor the fee should be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of the daughter's husband, or be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or the diligence of his or her creditors, "but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life, and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them." At the truster's death his daughter was married and had issue. Held by a majority of seven Judges that the trustees were bound to convey to the daughter in fee, subject to the condition that the right of succession of her children should not be defeated by any gratuitous act. The minority were of opinion that the conveyance should be to the daughter and her children in such terms as should restrict her right to a liferent annuallly. Gibson's Trustees v. Ross, et al., July 12, 1877, p. 1038.

FEE AND LIFE-RENT—Continued.

Residue.

4. A testatrix, in a testamentary letter of instructions, after bequeathing certain legacies, directed her law-agent "to hold the residue of my estate and distribute it annually between the following gentlemen," &c. Held that this was a bequest of the fee of the residue to the persons named. Anderson v. Thomson, July 17, 1877, p. 1101.

FISHINGS. Title to fishings ex adverso of lands at one time held in karels by way of rundale.

1. An estate held in karels by way of runrig or rundale was divided in 1795 into two continuous portions by decret-arbitral, which reserved to "both parties the right of salmon-fishing on the river Tay respectively belonging to them, according to their present boundaries." Each proprietor had always exercised the exclusive right of fishing ex adverso of his own karels, and continued to do so as formerly between the date of the decret-arbitral in 1795 and 1874. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division, July 14, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 1031, q. v.), in an action raised in 1874, that the title to the salmon-fishing ex adverso of what had been the respective karels of the two proprietors was separate and exclusive, and not pro indiviso subsequent to the date of the decret-arbitral, without deciding whether before the decret-arbitral the title was separate and exclusive, or pro indiviso. Richardson, &c. v. Baroness Gray, &c., June 29, 1877, H. L. p. 76.

Crown Grant.

2. A grant of salmon-fishings having been followed by possession so far as the fishings were available for the time, and the Crown having had no adverse possession, held (aff. judgment of First Division, July 14, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 1031, q. v.) that the Crown could not, cum effectu, make a grant to a different party of part of the fishings within the bounds of the original grant, although that part had not hitherto been fished, and had only not become available for being so. Richardson, &c. v. Baroness Gray, June 29, 1877, H. L. p. 76.

Operations on bed of river to improve Fishings.

3. Harbour commissioners under Acts of Parliament diverted the channel of a tidal river, having purchased the salmon-fishings at that part of the river. When the diversion was completed there was a steep embankment or bank of the altered channel, which prevented fishing from that side and the take of the fishings was reduced to less than half its previous amount. After three years they proceeded to reduce the slope of the embankment by laying stones and gravel at the foot of it, extending into the bed of the river. The effect of these operations was to diminish the depth of water at that part of the channel, and to enable the proprietors of the fishing to catch more fish, but not to obstruct the passage of fish up the river. An application for interdict, at the instance of the proprietors of the immediately superior fishings, on the ground that the harbour commissioners had no right to use their statutory powers for the benefit of the salmon-fishings, and that, as proprietors of the salmon-fishings they had no right to execute any operations (except repairs) on the bed of the river, refused. West v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Dec. 8, 1876, p. 207.

Embankment—Obstruction to the Passage of Salmon.

4. Part of a barony consisted of a long narrow island in an estuary, between which and the shore there existed a side channel dry at low water. Prior to 1857 a long stretch of foreshore extended down the estuary from the seaward end of the island, forming a bank which prevented the water in the main channel of the river at low tide from spreading over a large stretch of shallow. A breach having been made in this foreshore by the stream at low tide, in consequence of the erection of a weir on the opposite side of the estuary, the proprietor of the barony and salmon-fishings, in 1862, raised the foreshore by an artificial embankment which, in 1868, he raised to the height of sixteen inches above the original level of the foreshore. The embankment was found to afford him additional facilities for salmon-fishing. A proprietor of salmon-fishings on the river having in 1875 objected to the embankment as an illegal obstruction to salmon passing up the river, held (1) that the proprietor was entitled to restore the foreshore; and (2) that the embankment, whether regarded by itself or as affording to the proprietor greater facilities for the capture of salmon was not in fact an obstruction in the sense of the Salmon Fishery Acts. Duke of Sutherland v. Rosa, May 26, 1877, p. 765.

FISHINGS—Continued.

FOREIGN. See Jurisdiction, 3.

FRANCHISE. See Index of Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1195.

FRAUD.

1. A stockbroker's clerk, who had general authority to represent his principal on the exchange, entered into speculative transactions for his own behoof in his principal's name, without his knowledge, but for which the principal was bound. In order to meet a balance due by the principal, resulting from the clerk's speculations, on settling day, the clerk cashed a forged cheque at a bank, and applied the proceeds for that purpose. Held that the principal was bound to repay the amount to the bank, in respect (1) that the money had been obtained by the fraud of his representative (though that would not have been sufficient of itself), and (2) that the principal had been benefited by the fraud to that amount. Clydesdale Banking Company v. Paul, March 8, 1877, p. 626.
2. A debtor to a bank transferred certain shares in a joint stock company to the bank absolutely, but really in security of a portion of his debt. He afterwards sold the shares and paid the price to the bank, who executed a transference to the purchaser, and granted a discharge pro tanto of the debt. In an action by the purchaser against the bank concluding for rescission of the contract of sale and for repayment of the price, on the footing that the bank were the true owners, and on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the seller, held by Lord Shand (1) that although the debtor had induced the sale by fraud the bank were no parties to the fraudulent representations; (2) that the debtor being entitled to sell the shares did not do so as the agent for the bank, although they received the price; (3) that though the bank could not have retained the benefit of the seller's fraud gratuitously, yet as they gave onerous consideration by releasing their security and discharging the debt pro tanto, they were not liable to make restitution of the price of the shares. Gibbs v. British Linen Company, June 23, 1875, p. 630, note.

See Appeal to House of Lords—Insurance—Issue—Lease, 11—Prescription.

GABLE. See Property, 5.

HARBOUR. Quay Wall.

1. Circumstances in which, in virtue of possession upon an ancient grant of harbour, and upon the terms of local Acts, statutory harbour trustees were held entitled to construct and maintain a continuous line of quay wall along a harbour, and to prevent the proprietor of an adjoining shipbuilding yard from having a launching slip or opening through the quay wall into the harbour. Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Weir, Nov. 7, 1876, p. 79.
2. Fraserburgh Harbour Commissioners held not entitled under their local Act to levy dues on wreckage of vessel wrecked in the harbour. Wallace v. Fraserburgh Harbour Commissioners, decided Dec. 10, 1876, p. 368.

See Fishings, 3.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. See Succession, 3, 4.

HOTEL, PROPERTY IN DESCRIPTIVE NAME OF. See Trademark.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Constitution of Marriage—Res Judicata.

1. In 1842 A raised an action of declarator of marriage, and in the summons, as originally framed, laid his case principally on de presenti acknowledgment, though the summons contained some ambiguous expressions which might be read as averring promise and cohabitation. Afterwards on review he added a distinct averment of promise subsequeute copula. In the course of the action an interlocutor was pronounced allowing him an opportunity of proving the alleged copula, but he adduced no evidence. In 1846 decree of absolutor was pronounced. In 1875 A raised an action of reduction of the decree of absolutor on the ground of perjury, and subornation of perjury, and of declarator of marriage, founding specially on promise subsequeute copula. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division), that this action was barred by mora and exceptiones rei judicatæ. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., March 6, 1877, H. L., p. 32.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Mutual Settlement—Jus Mariti—Legitim—Testing Clause—Executor—Personal and Transmissible.

2. A and his wife caused a mutual settlement to be prepared disposing of their whole estates after their deaths. The deed was duly signed by A before witnesses; but although his wife signed it, she did not do so, nor acknowledge her signature, before witnesses. The deed contained a declaration that the provision for their daughter B was to be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband. After the death of A, his widow and three children, including B (whose husband had deserted her), entered into a minute of agreement, whereby, on the narrative that the testing-clause of the settlement had not been filled up, they agreed to hold that the estate was intestate succession, and proceeded to divide it among themselves. The husband of B was no party to this agreement, nor, though he afterwards returned and lived with his wife for a short time, did he either approve of or challenge it. After the death of the mother and of B's husband A's executor became bankrupt. B's son, as executor to his father, claimed in the sequestration one-third of his grandfather's estate, as the share ab intestato due to his mother, which had passed jure mariti into the estate of his father. In an appeal against the rulings of the trustee and Sheriff-substitute, who rejected the claim, the Court allowed the trustee to complete the testing-clause of the mutual settlement, and thereafter held (1) that the mutual settlement, as completed, was valid and effectual as a testamentary settlement of the means and estate of the father; (2) that by the terms of the settlement the jus mariti and right of administration of B's husband had been effectually excluded; and (3) that when B's right to legitim emerged on the death of her father the same did not vest in her husband ipso jure, and that whether he could have claimed it effectually or not his executor was not entitled to claim it.

Opinions, in conformity with Stevenson v. Hamilton, Dec. 7, 1838, that in the above circumstances the husband would not have been entitled to claim his wife's legitim. Millar v. Birrell, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 87.

Wife's Liferent unprotected by Trust—Renunciation—Donation inter virum et uxorem.

3. Held that it was competent for a wife infeft in a liferent of her husband's heritage, conferred upon her by antenuptial marriage-contract, to consent to an alienation by the husband, for onerous causes, of the liferent subjects and that such consent, judicially ratified, was not revocable by her as a donation inter virum et uxorem. Standard Property Investment Company v. Cowe, March 20, 1877, p. 695.

Mutual Settlement—Donatio inter virum et uxorem—Jus quæsitum tertio—Revocation.

4. A husband and wife, who had married without an antenuptial contract, executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed the whole estate presently belonging or which should belong to the spouses, jointly or individually, at the death of the predeceaser, to trustees, who were directed to allow the survivor the liferent use and enjoyment of the estate, and, upon the death of the survivor, to realise and pay over the same in equal halves to relations of the husband and wife respectively. It was specially declared that upon the death of the predeceaser the deed should become absolute and irrevocable, and delivery was dispensed with. The husband was possessed of about £3000, of which a considerable part was heritage, and the wife was possessed of two heritable bonds, together amounting to £460. Upon the death (in 1874) of the wife, who was the predeceaser, the trustees entered into possession of the estate. In an action of declarator against the trustees at the instance of the husband, who had contracted a second marriage, held that the mutual settlement was revocable by the husband in so far as it disposed of his own estate, on the condition undertaken by him in a minute lodged in process, that he should renounce all benefit from his wife's settlement. Mitchell v. Mitchell's Trustees, June 5, 1877, p. 800.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Mutual Settlement—Revocation.

5. A mutual settlement by a husband and wife held to be onerous and irrevocable in so far as it made a reasonable provision to the wife in the event of her survivance, but to be validly revoked by a subsequent settlement by the husband (who predeceased) quoad the ulterior destination of her property. Gibson's Trustees v. Gibson, June 8, 1877, p. 867.

Divorce—Lenocinium.

6. Behaviour of a husband who had been told that his wife had committed adultery, which was held not to bar him, on the ground of lenocinium, from obtaining a divorce on account of a subsequent act of adultery. Munro v. Munro, Jan. 25, 1877, p. 332.

Divorce, effect of.

7. Held that a husband, who had been divorced on account of his adultery, had a title to sue for moveable estate which had vested in his wife prior to the date of the decree of divorce, but had not been paid. Ferguson v. Jack's Executors, Jan. 30, 1877, p. 393.

See Alimentary Provision, 1—Parent and Child—Provisions to Wives and Children.

INDICTMENT. See Index of Judiciary Cases, p. 1197.

INSURANCE. Fraudulent Misrepresentation.

Circumstances in which a policy of life assurance in the hands of onerous assignees was reduced on the ground of false statements made by the assured in applying for the policy, with reference (1) to his habits of life, (2) his health, and (3) his transactions with other companies. Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society v. Buist, &c., July 13, 1877, p. 1076. [Aff. in H. L. Feb. 1878.]

See Ship, 1.

INTERDICT. Trespass—Bona fides.

1. A person in good faith entered upon lands without permission from the proprietor, and dug holes to trace an old drain for the purpose of obtaining evidence for a jury trial then proceeding. The proprietor, a month after, presented a petition for interdict. Held that there was no ground for the application, and petition dismissed, with expenses. Hay's Trustees v. Young, Jan. 31, 1877, p. 398.

Trespass—Leave from tenant.

2. A landlord applied for interdict against a person entering upon a piece of ground belonging to him, but let for agricultural purposes, and averred that the trespass was committed in order to obtain a short cut to an adjoining railway station, and that he feared a right of way might be acquired. The respondent did not assert that there was a right of way, but averred that he had leave from the agricultural tenant, who was not a party to the petition. Application refused. Steuart v. Stephen, June 12, 1877, p. 873.

See Fishings, 3—Nuisance—Patent, 3—Right in Security.

INTEREST. Price payable by instalments—Payments in Error—Repetition.

In a mineral lease it was stipulated that the lessees should take over the machinery and plant as valued by a named valuator, "the amount of such valuation to be payable . . . by ten equal instalments extending over a period of ten years, each of which instalments shall be payable at the term of Whitsunday yearly, and shall bear interest in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof at the rate of five per centum per annum on the amount which may remain due until payment, but the lessees shall have power to pay up the whole sum at any earlier period when it may be convenient for them to do so ; " it was declared also that though they might be in possession of the plant, &c., and have the use of it, it was to remain the property of the lessor "until the whole price and interest thereof shall be paid." For three years the lessees paid the instalments, and each year they also paid a sum of interest at the rate of five per cent upon the unpaid balance of the whole price. In an action at the instance of the lessor for an unpaid instalment and interest on the unpaid balance of the whole price, held that the lessees were only liable for interest on instalments in arrear, and that the previous payments of interest having been made in error the lessees were entitled to credit for the overpayments in accounting with the lessor. Baird's Trustees v. Baird and Company, July 10, 1877, p. 1005.

INTEREST—Continued.

See Diligence.

ISSUE. Fraud—Essential Error.

In an action of reduction of a lease brought by a landlord against the tenant the pursuer averred that the lease had been impetrated by the fraudulent representations of the defender's son, who was agent for the pursuer, in pursuance of a fraudulent conspiracy between the defender and his son, and that it was signed by the pursuer under essential error, induced by the said representations. The Court held (1) that the pursuer was not entitled to a separate issue of essential error ; and (2) that to the issue "Whether the pursuer was induced to execute the lease by fraudulent representation made by the defender" (being the issue adjusted by the Lord Ordinary), he was entitled to have added the words "or by his son on his behalf." Beresford's Trustees v. Gardner, Jan. 27, 1877, p. 363.

See Proof, 2—Reparation, 11.

JOINT ADVENTURE. See Partnership, 1.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. See Public Company.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. See Partnership, 4.

JUDICIAL INSPECTION. See Lease, 3, 4.

JURISDICTION. Dean of Guild.

1. Dean of Guild jurisdiction of police magistrates under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 408. Tainsh v. Magistrates of Hamilton, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 315.

Court of Justiciary.

2. The Circuit Court of Justiciary, in disposing of a small debt appeal, may competently remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the cause, with power to decern for the expenses of the appeal. Glass v. Laughlin, Nov. 10, 1876, p. 108.

Court of Session—Proprietor of Scotch Heritage.

3. Held that the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, founded on proprietorship of heritage in Scotland, ceases when the proprietor grants an absolute conveyance of the subjects, although he has not been feudally divested. Bosman v. Wright, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 332.

House of Lords—Prorogated Jurisdiction.

4. In an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Session which decided a question of alleged infringement of patent, the House of Lords, while holding that the proceedings in the Court below were irregular and did not competently raise the question, at the request of parties decided the question of the alleged infringement. Dudgeon v. Thomson, July 10, 1877, H. L. p. 88.

JUSTICIARY COURT. See Process, 18, and also separate Index of Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary, p. 1197.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Lease—Reparation, 1.

LEASE, CONSTITUTION OF. Possession referable to two offers.

1. A person made a written offer for a lease of a farm on 14th August. At the request of the landlord's factor he met him, and on 12th September subscribed a second offer appended to printed conditions of lease. The second offer omitted certain stipulations in favour of the tenant, and contained new conditions chiefly in favour of the landlord. There was no written acceptance, but possession followed at Martinmas. In defence to an action by the landlord to compel the tenant to execute a lease in terms of the second offer the tenant stated that when he signed the second offer he did so on the understanding that it was relative to and to be taken in conjunction with the first. Held that the second offer being only made binding by the possession which followed upon it, proof must be allowed to ascertain whether the possession was referable to the second offer only, or to both. Duke of Hamilton v. Buchanan, Jan. 25, 1877, p. 328.

Sequel of preceeding case.

2. It was proved that the tenant had entered into possession of the farm in the belief that the terms of the lease were to include stipulations in the first as well as the second offer, while the landlord had given possession on the faith of the second offer alone. Held that there having been no consensus in idem placitum there was no contract of lease. Duke of Hamilton v. Buchanan, June 8, 1877, p. 854. [Aff. in H. L. March 8, 1878.]

Judicial inspection of buildings, &c.—A. S. July 10, 1839, sec. 137.

3. A tenant was bound by his lease to leave his farm buildings, &c. in good repair, or to pay for their being put in repair at the sight of a person to be appointed by the Sheriff. Three months and a-half after Martinmas 1875, when the lease expired, the landlord presented a petition in the Sheriff Court praying for authority to execute the necessary repairs at the sight of a person to be appointed by the Court. Held that the petition was not incompetent by reason of the delay or otherwise. Dickson, &c. v. Graham, May 12, 1877, p. 717.
4. Held that a petition by the landlord for judicial inspection of premises which the tenants were taken bound to keep in repair, with a conclusion for the expense of the repairs which the tenants should be found bound to execute in implement of the lease, was a competent and proper proceeding, although presented upwards of a year before what the landlord averred was the termination of the lease, the tenants having vacated the premises and taken up the position that the lease was at an end. Lees v. Marr Typefoundry Company, July 14, 1877, p. 1088.

Sub-Lease.

5. A sub-lessee of a piece of building ground had the option under his lease of demanding a renewal if the tenant himself obtained a renewal from the landlord. Under a deed of agreement to which the principal tenant was a party, and in which he undertook certain obligations in regard to granting access, the sub-lessee sublet a portion of his holding to a second sub-lessee. The deed contained no assignation of the clause of option. The principal tenant obtained a renewal of his lease from the landlord. In an action against the principal tenant by the last sub-lessee, held that the pursuer was not entitled to a renewal of his sub-lease. Robertson v. Player, Dec. 12, 1876, p. 218.

Removing—Title to Sue.

6. In a summary petition for removing the tenant held not entitled to impugn the petitioners' title, it being proved that he could have no right to his holding unless derived from the petitioners. Dunlop and Co. v. Meiklem, Oct. 24, 1876, p. 11.

Removing—Personal Objection—Rei Interventus.

7. A tenant, who had given the landlord to understand that he was to remove,

PARENT AND CHILD—Continued.

Custody of Child.

2. In a petition by a father for the custody of his child, which was eight months old, the mother answered that she had been obliged to leave her husband's house shortly before the birth of the child in consequence of unkind treatment, and that owing to the tender age of the child it required its mother's care. The Court, without inquiry, ordered the child to be given up to the father, reserving to the mother right of access to it at any time she might desire, and appointing the child to be sent on a visit to the mother on a day in each week. Lilley v. Lilley, Jan. 31, 1877, p. 397.

Legitim.

3. Held that the right to repudiate conventional provisions made by a father in favour of a married daughter and claim legitim did not vest ipso jure in her husband, who had died without taking any steps to assert the right; and that whether he could have claimed the legitim effectually or not, his executor was not entitled to claim it. Millar v. Birrell, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 87. See also Husband and Wife.

Legitim—Collatio inter liberos.

4. Large cash advances made by a father to a son in business, and entered in the father's books as "By gifts payable to my son James as he requires," "By allotted for his business, free gift," and "By given over as free gift,"—held to be advances to account of legitim. Douglas v. Douglas, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 105.

PARISH. See Church—School.PARTNERSHIP. Joint Adventure.

1. A and B entered into a joint adventure for the purchase, bleaching, and reeling of 10,000 spindles of yarn. A authorised B to purchase the yarn at a price not exceeding 1s. 11d. per spindle. B then purchased the yarn at 1s. 11½d. in his own name from L, and granted bills for the price, without disclosing to him the existence of the joint adventure. In an action brought against A for the price, after B had become bankrupt, held that A was liable for the price to the extent to which he had authorised B to pay for the yarn. Lockhart v. Moodie and Co., June 8, 1877, p. 859.

Dissolution by Bankruptcy—Interest in Sinking of Pit.

2. Question upon the terms of a contract of copartnery, whether, upon the dissolution of the partnership by the bankruptcy of one of the partners, the bankrupt was entitled to be credited with a share of the value of pit sinkings. Glass v. Haig and Company, June 12, 1877, p. 875.

Joint Interest—Business carried on by a Family.

3. A family of brothers and sisters resided together, and without any deed of copartnery or definite agreement of any kind employed themselves in various branches of an extensive bakery, cooking, and confectionery business, which had gradually grown out of a small business in which the deceased father had been engaged, and in which his funds (never distributed) had been mainly embarked. Held, in the circumstances of the case, which were very special, that the concern was carried on for the joint behoof of the family, and that each member was entitled to an equal share of the profits. Aitchison v. Aitchison, June 16, 1877, p. 899.

Dissolution and Winding up—Judicial Factor.

4. Where, after the dissolution of a partnership, the two partners differed as to the winding up of the concern, and the realisation of its outstanding accounts, the Court refused a petition by one of the partners for the sequestration of the partnership estate and appointment of a judicial factor, on the ground that the questions between the partners really resolved into questions of accounting, which a judicial factor could not determine, and that in the realisation of outstanding debts the appointment of a judicial factor would be without advantage, and the cause of additional expense to the partnership estate. Gow v. Schulze, June 19, 1877, p. 958.

See Proof, 2—Public Company—Reparation, 9.

PATENT. Disconformity between Provisional and Final Specification.

1. The provisional specification of a patent stated the object of an invention to be to preserve animal substances for a long time in a fresh state, and that for this purpose the patentee dissolved a certain quantity of gelatine in hot water, and added a solution of bisulphite of lime. In the final specification the patentee claimed the use of the solution of bisulphite of lime without mixing it with gelatine and water. Held that this claim was not protected by the letters-patent as it was disconform to the provisional specification, and claimed more than the provisional specification. Bailey v. Robertson, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 545.

Manner in which the Invention is to be performed.

2. The final specification of a patent described the nature of the invention to be "to preserve animal substances, &c.," and then stated "the manner in which our said invention is performed is as follows,—we employ a solution," &c. The solution was then described, but no directions were given as to the mode of use. Held that this was not a sufficient disclosure of the manner in which the invention was to be performed. Bailey v. Robertson, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 545.

Disclaimer.

3. When a patentee alters his patent by a disclaimer he cannot thereafter enforce an interdict which he had obtained upon the patent before the alteration, as the amended patent may be liable to objections which did not apply to the former patent, and what would have been an infringement of the old might not be of the new. Dudgeon v. Thomson, &c., July 10, 1877, H. L. p. 88.

Infringement.

4. The patentee of a tool for expanding the ends of boiler tubes in the flue sheet claimed in his specification "the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz. the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instruments, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth." The expanding instrument was described as "a tapering plug, or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube." A manufacturer invented a new tool in which the rollers, being themselves tapered, were fixed at an angle with the axis of the tool, converging towards a point, so as to make the whole tool of a conical shape, and expansion was effected by screwing the tool into the tube, without any expanding instrument or divergence of the rollers. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division, Dec. 22, 1876, Court of Session Cases, p. 256) that there was no infringement. Dudgeon v. Thomson, &c., July 10, 1877, H. L., p. 88.

PAYMENT. Condictio indebiti—Overpayment by bill.

Averments that a contractor's account had been overpaid to the extent of £100, owing to a mistake induced by the representations of the contractor, held relevant to support a condictio indebiti, and proof prout de jure allowed, although it was pleaded that, as the overpayment had been made by a bill (which had been retired), proof must be restricted to writ or oath. Balfour v. Smith and Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, p. 454.

PERSONAL OBJECTION. Private knowledge of prior right.

Circumstances in which the purchaser of a piece of ground, a part of which had been, to his knowledge, occupied by a person other than the seller for a long period of years, and who admitted that he knew that the occupier had some sort of right, and had erected buildings on the ground, was held to have been put upon his inquiry as to the nature of the occupier's right, and to be barred from founding on his completed title to the lands as excluding a personal right held by the occupier to the dominium utile of the portion possessed by him. Stodart v. Dalzell, Dec. 16, 1876, p. 236.

See Superior and Vassal, 1.

PERSONAL OR TRANSMISSIBLE. Obligation to reconvey—Assignment.

In the course of a series of transactions in connection with a feu for building purposes N, the feuar, conveyed to C, who was his cautioner in the feu-contract, and had also advanced to him funds with which to carry on his building, the whole subjects, whether built upon or unbuilt upon. C a few days afterwards granted N a letter in which he undertook to reconvey to N upon demand and repayment of past feu-duties any of the lots which remained unbuilt upon. N assigned his interest in this letter to the trustees under his antenuptial marriage-contract. Held that the letter did not constitute a right of reversion but a distinct personal obligation upon C to reconvey any of the unbuilt-upon lots whenever called upon, and that the right to demand a reconveyance was validly assigned to N's marriage-contract trustees. M'Callum's Trustees v. M'Nab, &c., Feb. 21, 1877, p. 520.

PERSONAL OR TRANSMISSIBLE—Continued.

See Executor, 3.

POINDING THE GROUND. See Bankruptcy, 6.

POLICE. Edinburgh Police Act, 1848—Cleaning Common Stair.

1. Held that the obligation to clean a common stair or passage imposed by the 197th section of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848, on the occupants of houses, flats, or stories of tenements entered thereby, did not apply to the occupants of houses having their proper access by a main-door from the street, although entry from the common stair or passage was possible through a passage not intended to be used. Daish v. Paterson, Dec. 22, 1876, Judiciary Cases, p. 10.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 162—Projection of buildings beyond the line of a street.

2. A house, in a burgh under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, stood back some feet from the line of the street, and had a small plot of ground in front of it, separated from the street by a railing. The proprietor proposed to pull down the front wall of his house and advance it to the site of the railing in front, which projected somewhat beyond the line of the adjoining premises. Held that the 162d section of the Act above mentioned did not empower the commissioners of police to require the proprietor in rebuilding to keep the new front wall of his house in a line with that of the adjoining house. Fraser v. Kennedy, Jan. 9, 1877, p. 266.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 408—Dean of Guild Jurisdiction.

3. Held (by Lord Curriehill) that under the 408th section of the General Police Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, the magistrates of police of Hamilton, a burgh of regality which had adopted that Act, possessed the powers and jurisdiction relative to buildings pertaining to the Magistrates or Dean of Guild of a royal burgh in Scotland. Tainsh v. Magistrates of Hamilton, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 315.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862—Private Street.

4. A street constructed and maintained by the feuars on either side, to whom the solum belonged, and which was from 1870 to 1875 open to public traffic, but had not been sufficiently paved and flagged, was, in 1875, after the district in which it was situated had been erected into a burgh under the Police Act, 1862, ordered by the commissioners of the burgh to be properly levelled and causewayed at the expense of the feuars. Held that after this was done the street still remained a private street in the sense of the "General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," and that the feuars were entitled to exclude general public traffic by means of posts and chains. Kinning Park Police Commissioners v. Thomson and Company, Feb. 22, 1877, p. 528.

Glasgow Police Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii. sec. 384—Obligations to Fence River—Right of Way.

5. The Glasgow Police Act authorises the Master of Works to call upon "any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same, or repair any chimney-stalk, . . . or any rhone, sign-board, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous."

POLICE—Continued.

ous." Held that this did not authorise him to call upon the proprietor of lands, bounded by a public navigable and tidal river along the bank of which the public had acquired a right of footpath by prescription, to erect a fence between the path and the river. Kerr, Anderson, and Co. v. Lang, June 1, 1877, p. 779. [Aff. in H. L. Feb. 26, 1878.]

6. Suspension (in Court of Justiciary) of notice to pave footway. Lawson v. Police Commissioners of Forfar, March 16, 1877, Justiciary Cases, p. 35.

POOR. Settlement.

1. 1st, Circumstances in which held that an absence of some months did not break the continuity of residence in the acquisition of a settlement under the Poor-Law Act. 2d, It is a ruled point that facts and circumstances indicating intention to return or not to return to the disputed parish may be an element in a question of residential settlement. Beattie v. Smith and Paterson, Oct. 25, 1876, p. 19.

Settlement.

2. Held that a woman, imbecile from infancy, had from the time of her father's death, which happened after her majority, a derivative settlement from her father in the parish of his birth, and that the parish of her own birth was not liable for her support. Lawson v. Gunn, Nov. 21, 1876, p. 151.

Settlement—Constructive Residence.

3. A farm servant had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of X prior to Whitsunday 1866. From that date until 12th April 1875, when he became chargeable as a pauper, he continued tenant of a house in the parish of X, where his family resided. He himself was employed on farms in neighbouring parishes on which he personally resided, visiting his family at his own house in the parish of X regularly every fortnight, and sometimes more frequently, as the exigencies of his employment permitted. Held that he had retained his residential settlement in the parish of X. Cruikshank v. Greig, Jan. 10, 1877, p. 267.

Settlement of Illegitimate Child—Forisfiliation.

4. Held that an illegitimate child, living apart from his mother, on attaining the age of puberty became forisfiliated, and had then a settlement in his own right in the parish of his birth. Greig v. Ross, Feb. 10, 1877, p. 465.

Settlement.

5. Held that permanent disability to earn a livelihood, when not combined with mental incapacity, did not prevent a pupil from having a settlement in his own right when he reached the age of puberty and was forisfiliated. Greig v. Ross, Feb. 10, 1877, p. 465.

Admission of Liability.

6. Held, in conformity with Beattie v. Arbuckle, Jan. 15, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 330, that where one parish has deliberately admitted to another liability for the support of a pauper, it cannot withdraw that admission and open up the question of liability on the ground that the admission was made in error either as to the facts or as to the law. Young v. Gow, Feb. 9, 1877, p. 448.

Liability of Parishes inter se—Mora.

7. A parish after admitting liability for a pauper's aliment to a relieving parish and paying its advances, subsequently intimated withdrawal of the admission, which the relieving parish refused to accept. The relieving parish, founding on the admission, frequently applied for payment, and ultimately after seven years raised an action. Held that the action was not barred by mora. Young v. Gow, Feb. 9, 1867, p. 448.

See School, 3.

POSSESSION. See Teinds.

PRESCRIPTION. Vicennial Prescription of Retours—Stat. 1617, c. 13—Fraud.

An action of reduction of a retoured decree of service was brought after the lapse of fifty-six years, upon the allegation that the person served was not the true heir. The summons also contained vague allegations to the effect that the service had been obtained by fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury. The defenders called were singular successors in the property taken up by the service. Deducting minorities, the full period of the long prescription had not elapsed. Held that the action was barred by the vicennial prescription of retours. Rocca v. Catto's Trustees, Nov. 2, 1876, p. 70.

PRESCRIPTION—Continued.

See Teinds.

PROCESS.

Summons.Joint Pursuers—Joint Defenders

1. In an action at the instance of several proprietors of different lands on the banks of a river against several firms of paper manufacturers having their works at different places on its course, concluding for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to have the water of the river transmitted in a state fit for the primary uses, and for interdict against the pursuers polluting the same, the defenders pleaded that the pursuers were not entitled to sue jointly or to maintain the action against the several defenders, in respect that the rights and interests of the several pursuers and of the several defenders were different, that the summons did not set forth a joint cause of action, each defender being responsible only for his own acts, and that the calling of the defenders in one action was oppressive. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the action having been brought by persons jointly interested in preserving the stream from pollution alleged to result from the works of all the defenders, and the conclusions of the summons being merely for declarator of the pursuers' right to prevent that pollution and for interdict, the conjunction of the several pursuers and of the several defenders in one action was competent and convenient. Cowan and Sons, &c. v. Duke of Buccleuch, &c., Nov. 30, 1876, H. L., p. 14.

Contingency—Conjunction.

2. Three actions raised by riparian proprietors, concluding for interdict against owners of paper-mills upon the banks of a river polluting the water were conjoined by the Court, although some of the parties in one of the actions were not parties in the others. (Held, aff. the judgment of the Second Division) that the conjunction was competent and convenient. Cowan and Sons, &c. v. Duke of Buccleuch, &c., Nov. 30, 1876, H. L., p. 14.

Summons, Amendment of—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

3. A summons concluded for implement of an agreement, consisting of eight heads, between the outgoing and incoming tenants of a farm. It was averred in the condescendence that certain points were agreed to by the parties verbally, and that then the agreement was reduced to writing and agreed to in draft by both parties, and followed by rei interventus, but that the defender afterwards refused to sign it. After a proof the Lord Ordinary dismissed the action. The pursuer reclaimed, and proposed to amend his summons without altering the condescendence, by limiting the conclusions to one of the eight heads of the agreement, which he averred was verbally agreed to (before the agreement was reduced to writing), and afterwards followed by rei interventus. Motion refused, on the ground that the amendment would raise a different question between the parties from that intended by the summons. Gibson's Trustees v. Fraser, Feb. 10, 1877, p. 1001.

Proof.

4. Circumstances under which the pursuer of an action of damages for personal injury was held bound to submit himself for examination prior to the trial by a particular medical man selected by the defender. Junner v. North British Railway, March 17, 1877, p. 686.

Judgment.Interim Decree for Expenses.

5. Where the pursuer in an action concluded both for damages and for costs and reckoning, and the Inner-House, upon a report on issues by the Lord PROCESS—Continued.

- Ordinary, dismissed the conclusion for damages, with expenses—held (by Lord Curriehill) in conformity with Struthers v. Dykes, 8 D. 815, that the payment of expenses to the defender was a condition precedent to any subsequent procedure under the other conclusion of the action. Wallace v. Henderson, Dec. 22, 1876, p. 264.
6. Held (by Lord Curriehill) in conformity with Dalmahoy and Cowan v. Maga. of Brechin, 21 D. 210, that interest runs upon an interim decree for expenses when the decree has been extracted and charged upon. Wallace v. Henderson, Dec. 22, 1876, p. 264.

Reclaiming Notes and Reponing.Reponing against Decree by Default.

7. The pursuer of an action of reduction, through the fault of his agent, failed to appear either personally or by counsel and agent at the diet of proof. Decree by default was accordingly pronounced against him. The Court, in the special circumstances of the case, allowed him to be reponed on paying to the defender the full expenses to which he had been put by the default. Morrison v. Smith, &c., Oct. 18, 1876, p. 9.

Reclaiming Note—A. S. 10th March 1870, sec. 1, sub-sec. 5, and sec. 2—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.

8. An interlocutor, approving of issues "for the trial of the cause," but neither appointing the cause to be tried by jury, nor fixing a day for the trial, held to be an interlocutor importing an appointment of proof, which might be reclaimed against within six days without leave of the Lord Ordinary. Mason v. Stewart, Feb. 21, 1877, p. 513.

Lodging Reclaiming Note in Process.

9. A reclaiming note was duly boxed upon the box-day in vacation, but owing to a misunderstanding on the part of the clerk of the reclaimers' agent the principal copy of the reclaiming note was not lodged in process at the Register House until the day after the box-day. These facts having been stated to the Court in the Single Bills, and the respondents not objecting, the cause was sent to the roll in the ordinary course. Harris, &c. v. Haywood Gas Coal Company, May 12, 1877, p. 714.

Review—Joint Minute—Reference to Lord Ordinary.

10. Terms of a joint minute by the parties in a cause which held not to exclude review of the Lord Ordinary's judgment Lindsay v. Walker's Trustees, June 9, 1877, p. 870.

Reclaiming Note—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 28 and 54—A. S. March 10, 1870, sec. 2.

1. Held that an interlocutor repelling a preliminary plea, and "appointing the pursuer to lodge such issue or issues as he proposes for the trial of the cause," was an interlocutor importing an allowance of proof, and might be reclaimed against within six days without the leave of the Lord Ordinary. Little v. North British Railway Company, July 4, 1877, p. 980.

Appeals from Sheriff Courts (for Review).

2. Procedure where no appearance was made for the respondent. Explanation accepted by the Court. Nicolson v. Munro, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 434.

Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71—A. S. 10th March 1870—Omission to lodge Prints in time.

3. In an appeal from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints within fourteen days after the process had been received by the Clerk of Court, as required by sec. 3, sub-sec. 1, of A. S. March 10, 1870, the agent having by mistake, as the day for lodging fell in vacation, lodged them on the box-day instead. An objection having been taken by the respondent to the competency, the Court, in the circumstances, overruled the objection, and sent the case to the roll. Walker v. Reed, May 12, 1877, p. 714.

Whole subject-matter of the Cause—Court of Session Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 53.

4. Held that an appeal from an interlocutor of a Sheriff was not competent, in respect that the whole cause had not been decided, the question of expenses having been reserved. Parochial Board of Greenock v. Miller and Brown, May 25, 1877, p. 737.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeals from Sheriff Courts (for Jury Trial).

Leave of Sheriff—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40—A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5.

15. A. S. 11th July 1828 requires that in advocations for jury trial from the Sheriff Court under sec. 40 of the Act 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, the leave of the Sheriff should be obtained in cases where the claim shall not be simply pecuniary, so that it cannot appear on the face of the bill that it is above £40 in amount. Held that an action in the Sheriff Court for 2s. 6d. per week of aliment to a man sixty-six years of age was a claim "simply pecuniary," and for more than £40, and could therefore be removed to the Court of Session under sec. 40 without leave of the Sheriff. Hamilton v. Hamilton, March 20, 1877, p. 688.

Leave of Sheriff—Appeal for Jury Trial under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40—Value of Cause—A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5.

16. Held that an action in a Sheriff Court praying for interdict and £5 of damages was one to which the 5th section of the A. S. 11th July 1828 applied, and could not be appealed for jury trial under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, without leave of the Sheriff.

Observations (per Lord Ormidale) as to the form of declaration contemplated by A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5. Rain v. Gibb, May 19, 1877, p. 732.

Amendment of Record.

17. An action of damages for slander contained in a newspaper article was appealed by the defenders from the Sheriff Court for jury trial. An issue was adjusted, and notice of trial was given. The defenders then proposed to amend the record, by adding an averment and plea of veritas. Amendment and counter issue allowed, on condition of the defenders paying the whole expenses of the pursuer since the closing of the record in the Sheriff Court. Keith v. Outram and Company, June 27, 1877, p. 958.

Particular Actions.Suspension.

18. In disposing of an appeal under the Small Debt Act to the Circuit Court of Justiciary the presiding Judge remitted to the Sheriff to proceed "as may be just," found the appellant entitled to expenses, remitted the account of expenses to the Sheriff Court Auditor, and granted power to the Sheriff to decern for the expenses, which he accordingly did. The appellant lodged a note of suspension in the Court of Session of a threatened charge for the taxed expenses, on the ground that the remit to the Sheriff to decern for expenses was ultra vires of the Circuit Judge. Held that the remit to the Sheriff was competent, and the suspension refused. Question, whether the suspension was competent. Glass v. Laughlin, Nov. 10, 1876, p. 108.

Suspension—Debts Recovery Act, 1867, sec. 17.

19. A decree under the Debts Recovery Act was pronounced against a debtor, who thereafter was sequestrated in England. After he had been discharged by the English Bankruptcy Court under a composition contract he was served with a charge upon the debts recovery decree. Held that it was competent to try the validity of the charge thus given in a suspension, and that section 17 of the Debts Recovery Act, excluding review of the decree, did not apply to the case. Samuel v. Mackenzie and Bell, Nov. 29, 1876, p. 187.

See Appeal to House of Lords—Expenses—Interdict—Issue—Proof—Res Judicata—Teinds—Title to Sue.

PROOF. Condictio Indebiti.

1. Proof prout de jure allowed of averments that a contractor's account had been by a mistake overpaid to the extent of £100, the alleged overpayment having been made by a bill which had been duly retired. Balfour v. Smith and Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, p. 454.

PROOF—Continued.

Joint Adventure—Trust—Act 1696, c. 25—Mandate—Agent and Principal.

2. In an action for payment of a share of profits of an alleged joint adventure the pursuer alleged that the defender, his co-adventurer, had, contrary to instructions, taken the title to heritage, belonging to the joint adventurers, in his own name. The defender denied the existence of the joint adventure, and pleaded that, under the Act 1696, c. 25, the pursuer's averment, being an averment of trust, could only be proved by the defender's writ or oath. Held that as the pursuer averred that he had not trusted the defender to take the title in his own name the Act did not apply, and that the pursuer was entitled to prove his averments prout de jure. Form of issue adjusted. Horne v. Morrison, July 3, 1877, p. 977.

Innominate Contract.

3. The proof of an innominate contract is not restricted to writ or oath unless the stipulations are of an unusual and extraordinary character. In defence to an action for payment of an account for stabling horses for an omnibus for several years the defender alleged that the pursuer had agreed to stable the horses free of charge in consideration of the omnibus departing from and arriving at the stabler's inn on its way to and from a railway station, held that the contract alleged might be proved prout de jure. Forbes v. Caird, July 20, 1877, p. 1141.

Hearsay.

4. In questions of pedigree family tradition as to propinquity may be proved by evidence of the deliberate statement of a deceased person, but only if it is shewn that he had special means of knowledge. Macpherson, &c. v. Reid's Trustees, Nov. 17, 1876, p. 133, aff. July 3, 1877, H. L., p. 87

Criminating Question—Statute 37 and 38 Vict. c. 64, sec. 2.

5. Section 2 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1874, enacts that "no witness shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery." Held that it is the duty of the Judge to prevent such questions being put to the witness, so as to save him from the necessity of declining to answer, unless he volunteers to answer or make a statement; and when such a question has been put, and the witness has declined to answer, neither the question nor the declination of the witness can be recorded in the notes of evidence. Cook v. Cook, Nov. 4, 1876, p. 78.

Reference to Oath.

6. Observed (per Lord Deas), that when, on a reference to oath of the constitution and resting owing of an alleged debt, a deponent admits receipt of a sum of money, and does not depone to having discharged himself of it in any way, the deposition is affirmative of the reference. Fenning v. Meldrum, Nov. 17, 1876, p. 148.

PROPERTY.

Property in Descriptive Name of Hotel—Distinguishing Variation.

1. Charleson v. Campbell, Nov. 17, 1876, p. 149.

Feu—Restriction.

2. All the feuars in a street held of a common superior under titles containing a restriction to the effect that "the houses to be built should all be single or self-contained lodgings." One of the feuars was proceeding to convert his house into business offices when an adjoining feuar objected. During the previous thirty years a large number of houses in the street had been converted, without objection, including two houses, within the last three years, in the immediate neighbourhood. Held that the right of the feuars to object had been lost by abandonment. Fraser v. Downie, June 22, 1877, p. 942.

Common Interest.

3. Two conterminous proprietors of houses and building stances in a street had, under their titles, derived from a common author a right of free ish and entry to their respective subjects by means of a meuse lane at the back.

PROPERTY—Continued.

Held that the one proprietor was not entitled to build a shop over the lane opposite his ground converting it into a covered passage. Bennett v. Playfair, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 321.

4. Held upon the titles, that the proprietor of the upper flats of a tenement had not a right of common property, but only of common interest, in the sunk area. Johnston, &c. v. White, May 18, 1877, p. 721.

Mutual Gable.

5. To an action by the proprietor of a tenement in burgh against the proprietor of the adjoining stance to recover one-half the cost of a mutual gable, of which the defender had taken the use, it was pleaded in defence (1) that the mutual gable having been erected by the common author of the parties no claim arose to the proprietor of one stance against the proprietor of the other; (2) that such use had been made by the common proprietor and by subsequent proprietors of the defenders' stance, of the mutual gable, that the defenders on purchasing the stance were entitled to assume that the claim for one-half the cost of the mutual gable had been extinguished or settled. Held (1) that the common author in conveying the one stance to the pursuers or their authors, with the tenement erected thereon, conveyed likewise a right as against himself or his singular successors in the adjoining stance to recover one half the cost of the mutual gable whenever they came to make use of it; and (2) that the use of the gable by the defenders' author was by buildings of such a temporary nature that the defenders were bound to have satisfied themselves by inquiry as to the state of the facts before they purchased. Glasgow Royal Infirmary v. Wylie, &c., June 15, 1877, p. 894.

See Fishings—Mines and Minerals.

PROVISIONS TO WIVES AND CHILDREN. Marriage Contract.

1. Terms of a trust-disposition held not to be in itself valid against creditors, nor to be rendered so by a reference to it in an antenuptial contract of marriage executed a few days after by the granter followed by marriage and the birth of a son. Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, p. 22.

Marriage-Contract—Jus Crediti.

2. Observations (per Lord-Justice Clerk) upon the jus crediti created by an antenuptial marriage-contract, in which the husband binds himself to convey a land estate to the heir of the marriage, with a substituted destination to others. M'Donald v. M'Donald, Jan. 11, 1877, p. 271.

Wife's Liferent unprotected by Trust—Renunciation.

3. Held that it was competent for a wife in feft in a liferent of her husband's heritage, conferred upon her by antenuptial marriage-contract, to consent to an alienation by the husband, for onerous causes, of the liferent subject and that such consent, judicially ratified, was not revocable by her as a donation inter virum et uxorem. Standard Property Investment Company v. Cowe, &c., March 20, 1877, p. 695.

Marriage-Contract—Clause of Conquest.

4. Held that life-interests and annuities to which a married woman became entitled during the subsistence of the marriage did not fall under a general conveyance of acquirenda by her to the trustees under her antenuptial contract, such a clause being read only as referring to principal sums. Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 13, 1877, p. 1082.

See Husband and Wife—Succession.

PUBLIC BURDEN. See separate Index of Valuation Appeals, p. 1196.

PUBLIC COMPANY. Duties and Obligations of Directors—Payments by Vendors to Directors.

1. Held that an original director of a company, formed for the purchase and working of certain mines, who had received a sum of £10,000 from the vendors out of the purchase money paid them, was bound to repay that sum with interest to the company, although the agreement between the

PUBLIC COMPANY—Continued.

vendors and him had been made before the company was formed. Observed that the defender's allegation that he had rendered services to the company to the value of the sum he had received from the vendors was irrelevant. Huntington Copper Company v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, p. 294. [Aff. in H. L. Nov. 29, 1877.]

Powers of Directors to bind Company.

2. Opinions (per Lord President and Lord Shand) that persons dealing with the directors of joint stock companies, although they must be held to have made themselves acquainted with the provisions of the statutes and articles of association under which the companies are incorporated, are entitled to assume that all notices of meetings, and notices of resolutions to be proposed at such meetings, have been properly given, and that shareholders cannot repudiate the actings of directors on the ground that no notice of a resolution conferring power on the directors had been given. Heiton v. Waverley Hydropathic Company, June 6, 1874, p. 830.

Purchase by Railway of Minerals—Sale—Servitude.

3. A proprietor sold to a railway company "the perpetual servitude and right to use and occupy so much of" certain ground "as is at present used and occupied by the piers or pillars of their viaduct." The private Act of Parliament of the company contained provisions similar to those afterwards enacted by the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, to the effect that minerals were excepted from the conveyance of lands purchased by the company, but that the company might acquire the minerals within forty yards of their works on payment of compensation. In a question between the railway company and the proprietor and lessee of the minerals the company maintained that they were entitled to prevent the minerals from being worked under and near the viaduct, so as to endanger the viaduct, without any compensation, because they had purchased a servitude of support, which implied that their works would not be endangered. Held that the right acquired by the company was subject to the same conditions in regard to payment of compensation for minerals as a statutory conveyance of the land in ordinary form. Caledonian Railway Company v. Henderson and Others, et c contra, Nov. 17, 1876, p. 140.

Railway—Compensation for Lands and Injuries thereto.

4. A paid way-leave for access to a railway over ground belonging to B. The railway company, in the exercise of compulsory powers, took a portion of B's ground to form a branch railway, to which A formed an access, without using B's ground, and ceased to pay way-leave. Held that the loss of way-leave was not to be taken into account in fixing the compensation to be paid by the railway company for the land taken. Aikman v. Caledonian Railway Company, July 10, 1877, p. 1020.
5. The expense of a second petition for winding up a company pending the first, will, in general, not be allowed. Circumstances in which they were allowed, the party being under a reasonable apprehension that the first petition might be withdrawn. Graham, &c. v. Edinburgh Theatre Company, July 20, 1877, p. 1140.

PUBLIC HEALTH. See Justiciary Index, p. 1198.

PUBLIC HOUSE. See Master and Servant, and Justiciary Index, p. 1199.

RAILWAY COMPANY. Formation of Line, and Purchase of Lands, Minerals, &c. See Public Company, 3, 4.

RAILWAY COMPANY, CARRIAGE OF PERSONS BY. See Carrier.

REI INTERVENTUS. See Superior and Vassal, 1.

REPARATION. Landlord and Tenant.

1. Held that a landlord of a house and shop was liable in damages sustained by his tenant through the sudden melting of an extraordinary accumulation of snow on the roof, in respect that the injury would not have been sustained if the construction of the roof had not been defective. Reid v. Baird, Dec. 13, 1876, p. 234.

REPARATION—Continued.

2. Passenger run over by a train while crossing the rails at a station where there was no bridge. Thomson v. North British Railway Company, Nov. 16, 1876, p. 115.

Pilotage authority—Unlicenced Pilot.

3. When harbour trustees, who are appointed "a pilotage authority" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, do not licence pilots under the powers conferred on them by Part V. of that Act, but employ unlicenced pilots at stated wages to pilot vessels into their harbour, and themselves receive the pilotage dues, and apply them to harbour purposes, they are liable for the fault of the pilots so employed by them. Holman, &c. v. Irvine Harbour Trustees, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 406.

Master's liability for fault of servant.

4. Held (by a majority of seven Judges, diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk), that the rule of law which imposes upon a master responsibility for injury caused by the fault of his servant, while employed in his service, applies only in cases where the person injured is a stranger, not connected with the work in which the servant is engaged, and that in other cases the master is only responsible for personal fault. Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Company, Feb. 10, 1877, p. 269.

Master and Servant—Common Employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 76.

5. A miner in the employment of contractors for driving a level in a mine belonging to a company, whose manager and underground manager were in charge of the mine, was killed owing to the negligence of the underground manager, who was admittedly a competent person. The pit was conducted under special rules in compliance with the Coal Mines Regulation Act. In an action of damages at the instance of the miner's father against the company, held (by a majority of seven Judges), that the company were not liable, as the miner, by becoming a member of the organisation of the mine, had taken upon himself the risk of injury from the fault of other members without claim for redress except against the person in fault. Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Company, Feb. 10, 1877, p. 269.

Liability of Master for Injury to Servant—Process—Relevancy of Averment.

6. In an action at the instance of a miner against colliery proprietors and their manager for damages for personal injury alleged to have been incurred by the pursuer in consequence of the proprietors or their manager having recklessly or culpably failed to properly support and prop the roof of the mine, the Court, on consideration of a proof, found that the pursuer having failed to prove fault on the part of the defenders, they were entitled to absolve. Stewart v. Coltness Iron Company and Dewar, June 23, 1877, p. 32.

Breach of Contract.

7. Measure of damages where mineral tenants had failed to remove in terms of a special stipulation in the lease. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees, Jan. 27, 1877, p. 369.

Breach of Contract of Sale—Measure of Damages.

8. When a buyer of goods refuses to take delivery, or otherwise intimates repudiation of the contract, the measure of the seller's damages for breach of contract is limited to the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of repudiation. Warin and Craven v. Forrester, Nov. 30, 1876, p. 190. [Aff. June 5, 1877, H. L. p. 76.]

Breach of Contract.

9. The pursuer of an action of damages for breach of contract set forth a letter of employment, which, after an obligation by the defender to pay the pursuer a certain salary for the first two years, proceeded—"At the expiry of the second year I engage to give you a substantial interest by way of partnership in my business, so that your annual income may be considerably increased." The pursuer averred that at the end of the two years the defender refused to implement the remainder of the contract. Held that the action was irrelevant, in respect that there were in the letter no termini habiles out of which a contract of copartnery could have been formed.

REPARATION—Continued.

Observed (per Lord President)—A contract which cannot be enforced by specific implement, in so far as regards its form and substance, is no contract at all, and cannot form the ground of an action of damages. M'Arthur v. Lawson, July 19, 1877, p. 1134.

Slander—Judge.

10. An action of damages against a Sheriff for slander, alleged to have been uttered by him while setting in judgment, held to be incompetent. Harvey v. Dyce, Dec. 23, 1876, p. 265.

Slander—Innuendo—Issue.

11. Form of issue adjusted to try an action of damages for slander against the writer of a newspaper article, founded on statements innuendoes as conveying a charge of dishonesty. Dun v. Bain, Jan. 24, 1877, p. 317.

REVENUE. Succession-Duty Act, 1853, sec. 2—Entail—Disposition—Devolution of Law.

1. Under a destination to the heirs-male of A, an entailed estate passed from one of A's heirs-male, who died without issue, to his nephew, the next heir-male, who was a great-great-grandson of the entailor. Held (by seven Judges) that in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act the nephew did not succeed by "disposition" to the entailor as his predecessor, but that his predecessor was his uncle, from whom he took "by devolution of law." Lord Advocate v. Earl of Zetland, Dec. 5, 1876, p. 199. [Aff. in H. L. Feb. 12, 1877.]

Succession-Duty Act, 1853, sec. 17.

2. A lady on her husband's death became entitled to payment of an annuity of £3000 provided to her by her husband's father in her antenuptial contract of marriage. The Crown claimed succession-duty from the widow as successor to her father-in-law who had predeceased her husband. The widow claimed exemption under sec. 17 of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, on the ground that the annuity had been granted for valuable considerations set forth in the marriage-contract, viz. (1) the settlement of £10,000 by her father upon the spouses and the children of the marriage, and (2) her renunciation of jus relicte and terce. Held, in sustaining the claim of the Crown (1) that the provision by the lady's father was not a consideration for the granting of the annuity in the sense of the Act, and (2) that the renunciation of jus relicte and terce was not a valuable consideration, the husband, at the date of the marriage-contract, having neither heritable or moveable estate. Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick, June 6, 1877, p. 815.

Excise and Customs—Spirits removed without permit—Incapacity of Seller to sue for price—2 Will. IV. c. 16, sec. 12, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 114, sec. 187.

3. Charge on a bill for the price of spirits which had been delivered without a permit suspended. Greig and Company v. Conacher's Factor, Nov. 28, 1876, p. 187.

Inhabited House-duty.

4. Dwelling-house and business premises under one roof, but without internal communication between them, liable as one house. Russell, March 6, 1877, p. 1143.

See Stamp.

REVOCATION. See Husband and Wife, 3, 4, 5—Succession, 2, 16.RIGHT IN SECURITY. Disposition ex facie absolute—Power of Sale—Liquid and Illiquid.

An absolute disposition of lands was qualified by a minute of agreement which declared that the disposition was granted in security of £6500, and of all other sums for which the lender might become liable on account of or advance to the debtor, and that in the event of the borrower failing to pay or relieve the lender on one month's notice that he desired payment or relief he should be entitled to sell the lands by public roup or private bargain. Three years after the lender gave an account to the borrower containing a detailed statement of factory accounts and of borrowed money, and bringing out a balance of £9424 due by the debtor, and gave notice of his intention to sell. Held that the debtor was entitled to interdict the sale without caution, in respect that the balance was not admitted or otherwise liquidated, and that the account consisted of miscellaneous charges and factory accounts which required an accounting. Lucas, &c. (Beneficial Trustees) v. Gardner, Dec. 2, 1876, p. 194.

RIGHT IN SECURITY—Continued.

See Bankruptcy, 6.

RIVER. Non-tidal River—Alveus—Navigation.

Held (rev. judgment of First Division, Jan. 26, 1877, Court of Session Com. p. 344) that where the public have the right of navigation in a non-tidal river the proprietors of the alveus are nevertheless entitled to erect buildings thereon, unless it can be proved that such buildings would interfere with or obstruct navigation. Observations on Bicket v. Morris, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. H. L. 44. Orr Ewing and Co. v. Colquhoun's Trustees, H. L., p. 116.

See Fishings, 3, 4—Police, 5.

ROAD.

Right of feuars in a burgh under the General Police and Improvements Act, 1862, to exclude general public traffic from a private street constructed and maintained by them. Kinning Park Police Commissioners v. Thorne &c., Feb. 22, 1877, p. 528.

See Servitude, 1.

SALE OF GOODS. Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.

1. Held that the section did not apply to a contract by which a shipbuilder sold the scrap iron lying in his yard and the scrap iron which should be produced during a certain period. Observed that the section only applied to cases where the purchaser acquired a jus ad rem specificam, of which the seller retained possession. M'Meehan v. Ross, Nov. 22, 1876, p. 134.

Rejection.

2. Circumstances in which it was held that the strict rule of law as to the immediate rejection of defective goods was not applicable. M'Carter v. Stewart and Mackenzie, June 14, 1877, p. 890.

See Reparation, 8.

SALE OF HERITAGE. Completion of Contract.

1. In an action concluding for declarator that certain fields had been sold to the pursuer it was proved that after a long correspondence the parties were agreed on the subject sold, and the price, and that the only question unsettled was what servitudes should be imposed on the subject to secure the amenity of the sellers' adjoining property, and that a draft conveyance prepared by the buyer's agent had been sent to the sellers' agent and returned revised, with a letter stipulating that the sellers should have an opportunity of going over and considering the draft, "in case we have overlooked conditions which should be inserted in it." Held that there was no concluded contract of sale. Heiton v. Waverley Hydrographic Company, June 6, 1877, p. 830.

Rei interventus—Locus penitentie.

2. Two persons having agreed for the sale and purchase respectively of a licenced public-house belonging to one of them, the result of the bargain was written out in duplicate by a third party, and the missives were signed by the purchaser and seller, each of whom retained one. The seller afterwards gave the tenant of the house notice to quit, and the purchaser let it to a tenant of his own selection. The purchaser's tenant having failed in getting the licence transferred to him, the purchaser repudiated the bargain before the term of entry. Held, in an action for implement at the instance of the seller, that (assuming the missives to be improbable) sufficient rei interventus had followed to render the agreement binding, and that there was no locus penitentie for the purchaser. Stewart v. Burns, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 469.

See Personal Objection—Public Company, 2, 3—Writ, 1.

SCHOOL. Education Act, 1872, sec. 9.

1. The Board of Education having decided a question as to the area of a parish for the purposes of the Education Act, held that their deliverance was not final, because it was issued without hearing the parties interested; but that the Court could not pronounce on the merits of the question, the decision of it being exclusively committed to the Board of Education or the Sheriff by the 9th section of the Education Act. Lochgilphead School Board v. South Knapdale School Board, Jan. 30, 1877, p. 389.

Education Act, 1872, sec. 55—Emoluments of Schoolmaster.

2. Held that a master who, at the passing of the Education Act, was in receipt of a fixed salary and the school fees, was entitled (1) to continued payment of his full salary, though he had for some time prior to the passing of the Act voluntarily employed and paid an assistant, whose place was afterwards filled by a regular assistant employed and paid by the school board; and (2) to the actual school fees paid in each year so long as the school remained on its former footing, and not merely to the average as at the passing of the Act. Fraser v. School Board of Carlisle, June 14, 1877, p. 892.

School Fees—Education Act, 1872, sec. 69.

3. Where a parochial board had refused to pay the school fees of a child, on the ground that they were "not satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees," held that an action against the parochial board for recovery of the fees could not be maintained. Callachan v. Paterson, Sept. 2, 1876, Justiciary Cases, p. 1.

SCHOOL BOARD PROSECUTIONS. See Justiciary Index, p. 1199.SERVITUDE. Right of Way—Jus spatiiandi.

1. Held that the uninterrupted use by the public from time immemorial of a piece of vacant and unfenced building ground as a general access to the shore of Leith, fortified by a possessory judgment of the Court in 1793 in an advocacy of a Sheriff Court process of interdict, did not entitle the magistrates of Leith, as representing the public, to prevent the one half of it being enclosed, a sufficient access to the shore being afforded by means of the other half. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith, &c., July 10, 1877, p. 997.

Servitude of Dam.

2. A mill-owner, who had by his titles a right to a dam and mill-lade on another's ground, held entitled to prevent the insertion of a pipe into the dam by a person who had obtained leave from the proprietor of the ground. Scottish Highland Distillery Co. v. Reid, July 17, 1877, p. 1118.

See Entail, 4—Public Company, 3.SHERIFF. Meditatio Fugæ Warrant.

1. Proper form of petition is that prescribed by sec. 6 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876. M'Dermott v. Ramsay, Dec. 9, 1876, p. 217.

Decree by Default—Conditions of Reponing.

2. An action of count and reckoning, failing which, for payment of £90, was raised in the Sheriff Court in November 1875. After protracted delays the defender twice failed to appear at diets for his examination as a haver, whereupon decree by default was ultimately pronounced in January 1877 for the sum of £90, with expenses. The defender having appealed to the Court of Session, held that the judgment of the Sheriff was properly pronounced, but the defender reponed upon payment of all expenses subsequent to the first prorogation of the time for lodging defences.

Observations on delays in Sheriff Court proceedings. Vickers and Sons v. Nibloe, May 19, 1877, p. 729.Decree by Default—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, sec. 20.

3. In an action in the Sheriff Court the Sheriff-substitute assolied the defender in respect of no appearance by or on behalf of the pursuer at the diet of proof. The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and represented that his failure to appear was caused by the illness of his procurator, and a mistake on the part of his clerk. The Sheriff adhered, and the Court refused an appeal. M'Gibbon v. Thomson, July 14, 1877, p. 1085.

SHERIFF—Continued.

Debts Recovery Act, 1867—Account appended to Summons.

4. An account appended to a summons in a debts recovery action contained entries of various dates "To goods," with the amount charged at each date. The defender stated as a preliminary defence the plea that the account was not detailed, which the Sheriff repelled. Held that the Sheriff was right in repelling the plea. Cox Brothers v. Jackson and Lamb, June 16, 1877, p. 898.

Debts Recovery Act, 1867, sec. 17.

5. A decree under the Debts Recovery Act was pronounced against a debtor who thereafter was sequestrated in England. After he had been discharged by the English Bankruptcy Court under a composition contract he was served with a charge upon the debts recovery decree. Held that it was competent to try the validity of the charge thus given in a suspension, and that sec. 17 of the Debts recovery Act, excluding review of the decree, did not apply to the case. Samuel v. Mackenzie and Bell, Nov. 29, 1876, p. 187.

Slander.

6. An action of damages against a Sheriff for slander alleged to have been uttered by him while sitting in judgment held to be incompetent. Harvey v. Dyce, Dec. 3, 1876, p. 265.

Appeal for Jury Trial—Leave of Sheriff—A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5.

7. Observations (per Lord Ormidale) as to the form of declaration contemplated by A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5. Rain v. Gibb, May 19, 1877, p. 732.

See Lease, 3, 4.

SHIP. Collision—Limitation of Liability—Insurance—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63), sec. 54.

1. A steamship, through improper navigation, ran down and sank another belonging to the same owner. The owner presented a petition, as owner of the vessel in fault, to have his liability limited in terms of section 54 of the above Act. In a competition which followed as to the distribution of the fund, held (1) that the underwriters of the sunk ship were entitled to rank upon the fund pari passu with owners of cargo and seamen, repelling the plea that they were excluded as being assignees of the owner; (2) that the petitioner was not entitled to claim for loss of freight or expenses of shipwrecked crew. In a question between the petitioner and claimants, held (3) that in estimating the "gross tonnage," as prescribed by the 54th section, the petitioner was entitled to deduct the berthage of the crew; and (4) that he was liable for interest at 4 per cent from the date of collision till consignment. Burrell v. Simpson and Co., Nov. 24, 1876, p. 177.

Collision—Limitation of Liability in—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, sec. 54.

2. The owner of a vessel who is entitled to have his liability for damage caused by the collision of his vessel with another restricted under section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, after presenting a petition for such restriction under section 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, is entitled to state a claim as in right of parties whose claims he has settled extrajudicially before presenting the petition, and so limit the ranking of the other claimants. Rankine, &c. v. Raschen, &c., May 19, 1877, p. 725.

Charter-party—Port of Discharge—Demurrage.

3. A ship was chartered to load a cargo of scrap iron, and "therewith proceed to Grangemouth, or so near thereunto as she may safely get." The cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the merchant's risk and expense. The vessel arrived in the roads at the mouth of the river Carron, on which the port of Grangemouth was situated, on 10th September, but the docks were full, and she could not get a berth. On the 12th, being still unable to get into dock, the master brought the vessel into the river and moored her off the entrance to one of the docks. On the 13th the master intimated to the charterers that he was ready to discharge. It was proved that vessels frequently discharged cargoes of a similar character by means of lighters, while lying in the river in the same position, but there was no practice as to cargoes of scrap iron, the trade in which was of very recent introduction at Grangemouth. Held that on 13th September the ship had reached her destination, and that the charterers were bound to commence the discharge on the following day. Brenner and Another v. Burrell and Son, June 19, 1877, p. 934.

SHIP—Continued.

Bill of Lading—Seaworthiness.

4. A bill of lading, after the usual obligation on the shipowner to deliver a quantity of wheat in like good order and condition as when shipped, contained a clause stipulating that the shipowner should not be liable for the negligence of the crew. In an action at the instance of the shipper against the owner, concluding for damages "caused by and through the insufficiency of the hull and appurtenances of the vessel, or by and through the gross carelessness and negligence of those in charge thereof for whom the defenders are responsible," an issue was sent to trial whether the wheat was received in good order and condition, and whether the shipowner had in breach of the undertaking contained in the bill of lading failed to deliver it in the like good order and condition. The jury returned a special verdict finding that the wheat had been damaged by sea water, and that through the negligence of some of the crew one of the orlop-deck ports was insufficiently fastened, and "that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby admitted to the hold after the ship had been five days at sea. The First Division, in applying the verdict, held that the clause exonerating the shipowner from liability for loss caused by the negligence of his servants applied, and entered up the verdict for the defenders (March 16, 1877, p. 657). In an appeal, held that the special verdict had not exhausted the case, as it did not find whether the ship was or was not seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that a new trial must take place. Steel and Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., July 20, 1877, H. L., p. 103.

See Expenses, 4.

SLANDER. See Reparation, 10, 11.

STAMP Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 19—Conveyance on Sale—Discharge of ground-annual.

- B entered into a contract of ground-annual with C whereby it was provided that he was to pay the amount of the ground-annual for twenty years, but might after that redeem it on payment of twenty-two years and a half's purchase of the ground-annual. After the expiry of the twenty years he paid the twenty-two and a half years' purchase-money and obtained a discharge. Held that the discharge fell to be stamped as a discharge of a security and not as a "conveyance on sale." Belch v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Feb. 24, 1877, p. 592.

STATUTE Edinburgh Street Tramways Acts, 1871 and 1874, 34 and 35 Vict. cap. lxxix. sec. 44, and 37 and 38 Vict. cap. lxxviii. sec. 4.

- A tramway company was bound by an agreement, embodied in its Act of incorporation, not to charge passengers more than 1d per mile or fraction of a mile (the minimum charge for each passenger being 2d.) They afterwards obtained an Act by which they were relieved of their obligation to lay certain lines, and were allowed instead to run omnibuses over these routes. This Act allowed them to charge "a sum not exceeding 2d per mile for first-class passengers on omnibus routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the second Act did not alter the rates chargeable for tramway passengers who did not use the omnibus routes. Edinburgh Tramways Co. v. Torbain, July 6, 1877, H. L., p. 87.

STATUTES.

1617, c. 13. See Prescription.

1681, c. 5. See Writ.

1696, c. 25. See Proof, 2.

39 and 40 Geo. III., c. 98, Thellusson Act. See Succession, 15.

9 Geo. IV. c. 58, Public Houses Regulation Act, secs. 19 and 20. See Master and Servant, 1.

17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, Part V. (Pilots). See Reparation, 3. Sec. 514—See Ship, 1, 2, and Expenses, 4.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, Public Houses Acts Amendment Act. See Judiciary Cases (Public House), p. 1199.)

25 and 26 Vict. c. 63, Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 54. See Ship, 1, 2, and Expenses, 4.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, Companies Act, 1862. See Public Company.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 101, Public Health Act, 1867. See Public Health (Judiciary Cases), p. 1198.

31 and 32 Vict. c. 96, Ecclesiastical Buildings, 1868. See Church, 1.

33 and 34 Vict. c. 97, sec. 19. See Stamp.

35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, Education Act, 1872. See School.

37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4—See Superior and Vassal, 2, 4. Sec. 15—See Superior and Vassal, 3, 4. Sec. 55—See Bankruptcy, 6.

39 and 40 Vict. c. 11, United Parishes Act. See Church, 3.

Police Acts, General and Local. See Police.

SUCCESSION. Mutual Settlement by Husband and Wife.

1. A deed bearing to be a mutual settlement by a husband and wife contained a conveyance by the husband of his whole estate in favour of his wife in lifertent and his children in fee, and a corresponding conveyance by the wife of her estate in favour of her husband and children. The deed was signed by the husband before witnesses, and by the wife, but not before witnesses. Held that it was effectual as a testamentary settlement of the husband's estate. Millar v. Birrell, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 87.

General Disposition—Special Destination.

2. A testator left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at the time of his death. Subsequent to the date of his settlement he purchased certain heritable subjects, and took the disposition in favour of himself and his assignees and disponees, whom failing, to his sister and her heirs and assignees whomsoever. Held that the subjects belonged to the sister as heir of provision, and were not carried to the trustees by the general disposition in their favour. Webster's Trustees v. Webster, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 101.

Conversion—Reconversion.

3. A testator conveyed his estates, consisting of heritable and moveables, to trustees, who were directed, after payment of debts and a legacy, to divide the residue equally among the testator's four unmarried sisters. Power was given to the trustees to sell the heritable or make it over at a valuation to one of the beneficiaries. The eldest sister was the sole accepting trustee. The heritable was never sold, and the sisters possessed it in common, the eldest drawing the rents and dividing them. When one of the sisters was married a valuation of the heritable was made and one-fourth of the value was paid to her as her share, she conveying to the others her whole interest in the estate. One of the unmarried sisters having died, held that her share of the heritable was heritable—Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure holding that there had been no conversion, Lord Shand (concurring with Lord Adam, Ordinary), holding that the terms of the deed implied conversion, but that the actings of the beneficiaries had operated reconversion. Hogg v. Hamilton, &c., June 7, 1877, p. 645.

Conversion—Power of Sale—Trust—Alimentary Provision.

4. A testatrix conveyed her whole heritable and moveable estate to trustees,

SUCCESSION—Continued.

"with full power to my said trustees to sell and dispose of the subjects above conveyed as they may think proper, and convert the same into cash, or to borrow money on the security of said subjects, or apportion and divide the same among my children after named as they may think proper or be advised." The concluding trust-purpose was to hold the residue of the trust-estate for the six children of the trust equally, share and share alike, and in case of any of the said children dying before majority or marriage, then the share of such child or children predeceasing should accrue to the survivors equally, with a declaration that the shares were to be strictly alimentary, and not assignable or attachable by creditors. No sale took place until after the children had attained majority. Held (1) that the declaration that the shares should be alimentary only applied to the period before the children attained majority, and that the trustees were then bound to convey to the beneficiaries; (2) that the fact of the residue consisting of heritage which could not be divided corporeally into the requisite number of shares did not render a sale of the heritage necessary, as the division might be made by granting pro indiviso rights, or by exercising the power to borrow; and therefore (3) that the right of each beneficiary was heritable, being a jus crediti to heritage. Auld v. Anderson, &c., Dec. 8, 1876, p. 211.

Special Legacy—Ademption—Deposit-receipt.

5. A lady on 23d March 1875, left a sealed packet with her law-agent marked "to be opened only in the event of my death," containing a letter dated the same day addressed to the law-agent with, inter alia, the following testamentary direction—"I empower you to uplift the deposit-receipt lying with you for £4000, to lodge it in your own name, and to hold it in trust for my mother's brothers and sister and for their children." She at the same time verbally instructed her law-agent to transfer the £4000 on deposit-receipt to his own name, promising to send written instructions as to its disposal, which were not sent. The law-agent at the same time said that he had made advances for her of £200 and would keep that sum out of the £4000, to which she agreed, and the balance was put in deposit-receipt in his name "in trust." On 12th May 1875 the law-agent suggested to her the investment of the sum upon a heritable security, for the purpose of obtaining higher interest. She agreed to £3500 being so invested, and this was done. The testatrix died on 8th June 1876. Held that the legacy was special, and had been adeemed. Anderson v. Thomson, &c., July 17, 1877, p. 1101.

Fee and Liferent—Residue.

6. A testatrix, in a testamentary letter of instructions, after bequeathing certain legacies, directed her law-agent "to hold the residue of my estate and distribute it annually between the following gentlemen. . . ." Held that this was a bequest of the fee of the residue to the persons named. Anderson v. Thomson, &c., July 17, 1877, p. 1101.

Lapsed Legacy—Charity.

7. A testator bequeathed a sum to trustees, directing them to pay the "clear annual interest or produce to the person officiating for the time as school-master in connection with the Established Church in said parish." Some years after the testator's death there ceased to be a schoolmaster answering the description. Held that the legacy had not lapsed.

Observed, that there would not be any difficulty in framing a scheme for applying the fund for some useful and beneficial purpose within the intention of the trust. Grant v. Macqueen, &c., May 23, 1877, p. 734.

Term of Payment—Residue.

8. A proprietor of an entailed estate, after making provisions of specific amount to his younger children, payable at majority or marriage, directed his trustees, after the purposes of the trust "have been fully satisfied by the succession to the lands of P opening to them," to convey the residue to his eldest son, under burden of an annuity to his mother. P was a property to which the testator had succeeded, subject to a life rent, and formed a very large portion of the estate at his own disposal. The life-renter predeceased the testator. Sums having been set aside to satisfy the provisions of certain of the younger children, of which the term of payment had not arrived, the eldest son called on the trustees to convey the residue to him. Held that, irrespective of the question whether the younger children's portion had vested or not, he was entitled to a conveyance. Scott v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1876, p. 229.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting.

9. A truster directed his trustees to pay the free income of his estates, after deducting an annuity to his widow, in equal portions to his brother and four sisters, and failing them without issue, to the survivors and survivor. He further directed his trustees, on the death of any of his brother or sisters leaving issue, to pay to such issue (and the issue of any predeceasers) the capital sum life-rented by their parents, so far as that could be done consistently with retaining enough to secure the widow's annuity; and, on the death of his widow, "to make over and settle my whole heritable and moveable means and estate . . . and that in equal shares, upon my said brother and sisters in life-rent for their life-rent use allienarly, and the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee." The truster was survived by his widow and his brother and four sisters. His brother and three sisters predeceased the widow, the brother and two of the sisters leaving issue. The remaining sister survived the widow, and died without issue. In a competition for the fee of the share life-rented by the surviving sister, held (1) that, although the fee of the shares life-rented by the brother and sisters who left issue vested in such issue a morte testatoris, or as soon thereafter as they came into existence, the fee of the share of the last surviving sister, who died without leaving issue, vested only on her death in the issue of her brother and sisters, or their descendants who survived her, as if the words, "survivors or survivor" had been "others or other," and that, therefore, as regards this share of the fee, intestacy was excluded; and (2) that the share vested in such surviving issue per stirpes. Ramsay's Trustees v. Ramsay, &c., Dec. 21, 1876, p. 243.

Vesting—Discretion of Trustees.

10. Where trustees were given a discretion as to the period of realising and dividing the estate, held that vesting took place at the earliest period at which the trustees might, in the exercise of their discretionary powers, have fixed the period of division, and was not postponed till the actual exercise of these powers. Scott, &c. v. Scott's Executrix, Jan. 27, 1877, p. 384.

Vesting.

11. A testator directed his trustees, upon the death of his widow, to invest in their own names three-fifths of the residue of his estate for behoof of his daughter and her husband in life-rent, for their life-rent use allienarly, and for behoof of their children, in such proportions as their parents, or the survivor of them, should appoint by writing; "and failing both of them without having executed such writing, then for behoof of their said children equally, share and share alike, in fee;" declaring that in the event of any grandchild dying without having received payment of his share and leaving issue such share should fall to the issue. The testator was survived by his widow, and also by his daughter and her husband, and by several of the daughter's children, three of whom predeceased their mother and the truster's widow without leaving issue. Held by Lord Shand (Ordinary) that a right to a share of residue vested in each of the grandchildren at the date of the testator's death, subject only to the condition that in the event of any grandchild dying before the term of payment and leaving issue the share of such child should belong to such issue. Snell's Trustees v. Morrison, March 20, 1877, p. 709.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Nati et nascituri.

12. A testator by his trust-settlement directed his trustees to pay the interest of £20,000 to his sister during her life, and upon her death to pay over the said interest, to the extent of £300 a-year, to his sister's husband, in the event of his surviving her. Further, upon the decease of his sister (but subject to the annuity of £300 provided to her husband) he directed his trustees "to hold and apply the said principal sum of £20,000 and the income" thereof, for behoof of the children of his brother B, "procreated or to be procreated," in equal shares, "payable, the several children's shares, to the sons on their attaining twenty-five years of age." Power was given to the trustees to expend the children's shares of income and to advance part of their shares of capital during minority. There was also a clause substituting the issue of children predeceasing the liferentrix to their parents, and a survivorship clause. The truster's sister died in 1875, survived by her husband. At that time the truster's brother B was alive, and two of his children had attained the age of twenty-five. Held (1) that no right vested in any child of B before the death of the liferentrix, or until his share became payable by his attaining the age of twenty-five; (2) that on that event the trustees were not entitled to withhold payment on the ground that other children might be born to B; (3) that the subsistence of the annuity of £300 did not prevent a partial payment to account of capital to those children whose shares had vested, £10,000 being reserved to secure the annuity; (4) that such interim payment should be made without caution. Buchanan's Trustees v. Buchanan, May 26, 1877, p. 754.

Payments of Income in anticipation of Vesting.

13. Where trustees were directed to hold £5000 and shares of residue for behoof of a mother in liferent, and of such of her children as should reach the age of twenty-five years and the survivors in fee, and where these provisions had not at the death of the liferenter vested in any of the children by reason of none of them having reached that age, the Court held that the children as a class were entitled to the accruing income for their education and maintenance, it being admitted that the testator had placed himself in loco parentis to them, and that the advances were necessary. Duncan's Trustees and Others, July 17, 1877, p. 1093.

Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

14. A testator bequeathed to his only brother, who died without issue, the liferent of the residue of his estate, and directed that such residue should, "after his death, be divided equally among the lawful children of my living and deceased sisters who may be alive at the time, share and share alike, namely, the children of the late Mrs P, the children of Mrs G," &c. The whole children of his sisters survived the testator, but some of them predeceased the liferenter, leaving issue. Held that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the issue of the testator's nephews and nieces predeceasing the date of vesting were entitled to their parents' share of the residue of the estate. Gauld's Trustees v. Duncan, &c., March 20, 1877, p. 691.

Accumulations—Thellusson Act, 1800 (39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98).

15. The grantor of a trust-disposition, on the narrative that he had executed an entail of an estate, directed his trustees to lay out the residue of the trust-funds in the purchase of land near the entailed estate so soon as a favourable opportunity occurred, and to entail the land so purchased on the heir of entail in possession of the estate, and to pay to him three-fourths of the interest or profits of the residue until a purchase could be made, "the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of the disposable funds." The trustees did not purchase any lands under this direction for thirty-four years after the truster's death. In an action of declarator afterwards raised by the heir of entail in possession against the trustees and the truster's next of kin, held (1) that the Thellusson Act applied to the accumulations so made by the trustees after the lapse of twenty-one years from the trustor's death; and (2) that the person entitled to these accumulations under the Act as the person "who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed" was the heir of entail who would have been entitled to the rents if the lands had been purchased, and not the trustor's next of kin. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, June 29, 1877, p. 961.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Partial Revocation of Conveyance.

16. An heir of entail in possession having in 1835 obtained a judgment declaring that the entail was ineffectual to prevent gratuitous alienation, died in 1845, leaving (1) a mortis causa settlement, whereby he disposed the estates to his brother A in liferent allanarly, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to his brother B in liferent allanarly, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of his deceased sister, whom failing, to his sister D and the heirs of her body, whom failing, to his "nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever;" and (2) a deed of restriction of subsequent date, whereby he revoked, cancelled, and annulled "the said destination and order of succession in so far as regards the persons called and appointed to succeed after my brothers therein named;" declaring it to be his intention "that the destination and order of succession in the said trust-disposition and settlement shall not take effect beyond my said brothers and the heirs of their bodies, and that the person or persons further called to the succession shall have no claim to the same, but shall be entirely excluded therefrom, and are hereby excluded accordingly." He reserved a right to name a new series of heirs, and declared that his trust-settlement, in so far as not restricted, should remain in full force and effect. After the death of A and B, who survived the trustor but left no issue, held, in a question between the next heir called under the destination in the entail and the disponees of the last brother B, who had served as heir in general to the trustor, (1) that the terms of the deed of restriction did not revoke the destination in the trust-settlement to the trustor's "heirs and assignees whomsoever;" and (2) that B's right as heir whomsoever was not prejudiced by the fact that a liferent allanarly had been conferred upon him by the same deed. Mackenzie v. Sharpe's Trustees, &c., March 14, 1877, p. 641.

See Alimentary Provision—Domicile—Fee and Liferent—Husband and Wife, 2, 4, 5—Trust

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Constitution of Feu-right—Writ of Superior—Reversion.

1. A proprietor of land entered into a verbal contract to feu, and upon receiving the first term's feu-duty granted a holograph receipt, which contained a note of the extent of the ground feued, and the amount of the feu-duty. The vassal entered into possession of the ground, and built certain erections on a part of it, and continued to pay feu-duty to the proprietor and his representatives, for which he obtained receipts as for "feu-duty," but these subsequent receipts were not holograph. Held that a contract of feu had been constituted, effectual against the superior and his representatives. Stodart v. Dalzell, &c., Dec. 16, 1876, p. 236. See also Personal Objection.

Casualty—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4.

2. Held that the implied entry given by sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, to a person holding an infeftment on an a me vel de me precept unconfirmed, had the feudal effect of extinguishing the mid-superiority, so that it was no longer competent for him to demand an entry in the character (which he possessed) of heir to the mid-superior, although this resulted in his being subjected in a higher casualty than if the Act had not been passed. Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley, May 26, 1877, p. 738.

Redemption of Casualties—37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, sec. 15.

3. An original feu-disposition granted in 1833 contained a clause excluding subinfeudation, fenced by an irritancy. The vassal was duly infeft. After various conveyances of the feu-right to disponees who did not enter with the superior, a dispositive, infest on a disposition which did not express the manner of holdings, raised an action against the superior, concluding for declarator that the feu was not in non-entry, the original vassal being still alive, and that the pursuer was entitled to redeem the casualties on payment of a year's rent of the subjects and 50 per cent additional, under section 15 of the "Conveyancing Act, 1874." The feu-disposition did not stipulate for payment of any casualty on a sale or transfer of the property. In defence the superior maintained that the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect (1) that he was not entered, his infestment not being confirmed, and (2) that the irritancy clause excluding subinfeudation enabled the superior to demand a casualty on each sale of the feu, and therefore that the redemption price was twice-and-a-half times the amount of the casualty. Held (1) that the pursuer had a title to sue, the Act of 1874 expressly operating as a confirmation of his infestment, and giving an implied entry; and (2) that as the superior could not compel an entry except on the death of a vassal, the pursuer was entitled to redeem at the price stated by him. Morris v. Brisbane, Feb. 21, 1877, p. 515.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Redemption of Casualties—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 15.

4. Held that a proprietor of part of a feu who was entered with the superior by the operation of sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, was entitled under sec. 15 of the Act to redeem the casualties in so far as applicable to his part of the feu, negating the superior's plea that the vassal could only redeem the casualties of the entire feu as set forth in the last charter. Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Company, &c. v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 10, 1877, p. 1032.

TEINDS. Heritable Right—Prescription—Possession.

1. A proprietor of lands who had no title to the teinds conveyed in 1766 several parcels of land to trustees for family purposes, "with the several manor-places, milns, teinds, &c., belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed, and contained in the particular charters and infestments thereof." The trustees, as directed by the truster, executed a conveyance in 1772 to a beneficiary in the same terms. The subsequent titles contained no mention of teinds. The proprietors did not pay teind to any titular, but they submitted to localities in 1837 and 1862, made on the footing that they had no heritable right to the teinds. In an action raised by the heritor in 1875, for reduction of the decrees of locality, and declarator of his heritable right to the teinds, held (1) that it was competent to ascertain by examination of the previous titles, though beyond the prescriptive period, whether the truster had a right to his teinds in 1766; (2) that as he had no such right, the trust-deed conveyed none.

Observations on the possession necessary to establish a heritable right to teinds. Mackintosh v. Abinger, et al., July 12, 1877, p. 1069.

Interim Locality—Bona fide Perception—Prescription.

2. Held in conformity with Weatherstone v. Marquis of Tweeddale (12 S. p. 1), that where payments of stipend are made under an interim decret of locality there is an implied judicial contract that when the legal obligations of the heritors are determined by final decret their several interests shall be adjusted from the commencement of the process according to the true state of their rights, and therefore that claims of relief thus arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settlement of a final scheme and decret may have been delayed, and that the defence of bona fide consumption cannot be sustained. Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell's Trustees, et al., July 18, 1877, p. 1126.

TESTAMENT. *See Succession.*TITLE TO SUE. Removing.

1. In a petition for removing, the tenant held not entitled to impugn the petitioners' title, it being proved that he could have no right to his holding unless derived from the petitioners. Dunlop and Co. v. Meiklem, Oct. 24, 1876, p. 11.

TITLE TO SUE—Continued.

2. Held that a husband who had been divorced on account of his adultery, had a title to sue for moveable estate which had vested in his wife prior to the date of decree of divorce, but had not been paid. Ferguson v. Jack's Executors, Jan. 30, 1877, p. 393.

TRADEMARK. Descriptive Name—Distinguishing Variation.

Held that the proprietor of a hotel near a railway station, known as the "Station Hotel," was not entitled to object to the proprietor of a neighbouring hotel adopting the designation "The Royal Station Hotel," in respect that the term "Station Hotel" was a descriptive designation applicable to both, and the word "Royal" a sufficiently distinctive variation. Charleson v. Campbell, Nov. 17, 1876, p. 149.

TRAMWAYS. See Statute.TRESPASS. See Interdict, and Justiciary Index, p. 1200.TRUST. Powers of Trustees—Agreement modifying Trust Purposes—Continuation of New Trust—Alimentary Provision—Nobile Officium—Special Case.

1. A testator left his estate to trustees, with directions to pay an annuity to his widow as the preferable purpose of the trust, and to distribute the estate, so far as consistent with securing the widow's annuity, among his daughters in half-yearly payments, which he termed "annuities," but which really were payments out of the capital of the estate which would have exhausted it in a very few years. From these annuities he excluded the jus mariti and right of administration of his daughters' husbands, and declared them strictly alimentary. After four years it was found that the trust had become unworkable, that the moveable property was exhausted, and that though power to borrow on security of the heritage was conferred, no further distribution could be made to the daughters without borrowing in a way prejudicial to their real interests, while the heritage still remaining in the trustees' hands was considerably in excess of what was required to secure the widow's annuity. The mother, and the daughters, who were all of full age, being the only parties beneficially interested in the estate and the trustees, entered into an arrangement for the conveyance by the trustees to the daughters of the remainder of the trust-estate, and for the creation by them of a new trust, securing the widow's annuity, and providing for the distribution of the property among themselves as an alimentary fund and exclusive of the jus mariti. A special case was then presented to the Court to determine whether the trustees had power to carry out this agreement. The Court, in respect of the clause in the original settlement declaring the daughters' "annuities" alimentary and excluding the jus mariti, but without deciding as to the effect of that clause, declined to sanction a conveyance of the estate to the daughters, but, inasmuch as the whole parties beneficially interested in the estate were parties to the agreement, authorised a conveyance by the trustees direct to new trustees for the purposes of the trust proposed in the deed of agreement, and containing a clause declaring the fund alimentary and excluding the jus mariti similar to that contained in the original settlement. Gray, &c. v. Gray's Trustees, Jan. 27, 1877, p. 378.

Discretionary Powers of Trustees.

2. A truster left the liferent of the whole residue of his estate to his widow, and gave power to the trustees to make advances out of capital to one of two fiars during the currency of the liferent, the expediency of doing so being left "to the exclusive judgment" of the trustees, "without control or interference from any party whatever." Held that the widow had no power to veto the trustees in making advances out of capital. Caithness Trustees v. Caithness, June 20, 1877, p. 937.

Powers of Trustees—Allowance for Children's Education.

3. Terms of a trust-deed in favour of the testator's wife and children, upon which it was held that the trustees were entitled, out of surplus income, to make such advances as they might think desirable either for the education of any of the children, or for such change of residence as might be considered necessary for the health of any member of the family. Christie v. Christie's Trustees, March 6, 1877, p. 620.

TRUST—Continued.

Authority to Sell Heritage and to make Advances from Capital.

4. Circumstances in which trustees under a trust-settlement which gave no power to sell were authorised, under section 3 of the Trusts Act, 1867, to sell heritable property, and under section 7 of the same Act to advance the price obtained for the maintenance and education of beneficiaries, who were minors. Weir's Trustees (Petitioners), June 13, 1877, p. 876.

Conduct of Trustees.

5. Wherever it can be shewn that a trustee has so arranged matters as to obtain an advantage, whether in money or in money's worth, to himself personally, through the execution of his trust, he will not be permitted to retain it, but be compelled to make it over to his constituent. Huntington Copper Co. v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, p. 294. [Aff. in H. L. Nov. 29, 1877.]

Effect of Trust-deed.

6. Terms of a trust-disposition which was held not to be in itself valid against creditors, nor to be rendered so by a reference to it in an antenuptial contract of marriage executed a few days after by the granter, followed by marriage and the birth of a son. Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, p. 22.

Defeasible Directions.

7. When a testator has directed a particular investment for behoof of a beneficiary who would have unlimited control over the investment if it were made the Court will not enforce implement of the direction. Dow v. Kilgour's Trustees, Jan. 31, 1877, p. 403.

Charitable and Educational Bequests—Powers of Trustees.

8. Changes held to be within the powers of trustees of an endowed school, who by the deed of foundation were authorised to make new regulations consistent with the original intention of the institution. Allan v. Stiell's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1876, p. 162.

Charity—Scheme of Administration.

9. Circumstances in which the Court approved an alteration on the scheme of administration of an educational charity for the purpose of adapting it to the altered requirements of the times, and, inter alia, authorised the substitution of bursaries for the payment of apprentice fees. Burnet's Trustees, November 17, 1876, p. 127.

No prescription against Trust—Mortification.

10. By deed of mortification the granter assigned certain sums to the town-council of a burgh to be invested and the proceeds applied towards the maintenance of two professors in a university. The funds were invested in land, which were managed for many years by the master of mortifications, an officer of the corporation, in whose name the title was taken. Afterwards the town-council appointed a portion of the lands, including a strip of land on the sea-coast, to be exposed for sale by public roup. The subjects were sold for payment of a feu-duty, and to a person who afterwards declared that he had purchased on behalf of the treasurer of the town, and the latter was infeft upon charter in his favour for behoof of the magistrates, council, and community. Soon afterwards the town-council, upon a representation that they were proprietors of the ground, obtained from the Crown a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the strip of land. In an action of declarator and accounting brought more than forty years afterwards by the university, with concurrence of two professors interested in the mortification, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) (1) that the town-council still held the lands in trust for the mortification, and that they could plead no prescriptive right against the trust; (2) that, having acquired the fishings in the character of proprietors of the trust-property, they were bound to communicate the benefit to the trust, and hold them for behoof of the trust ; (3) that the consent and concurrence of the two professors gave the university a sufficient title and interest to sue for arrears ; but remitted to the Court of Session to allow the parties to amend their pleadings, and to proceed with the cause with a view to ascertain how far back within forty years the accounting should extend, and on what principles it should proceed. Magistrates of Aberdeen v. University of Aberdeen, March 23, 1877, H. L., p. 48.

TRUST—Continued.

VALUATION. See Separate Index of Valuation Appeals, p. 1196.

WRIT. Testing-clause—Subscription of Witnesses ex intervallo.

1. Duplicate missives of sale of heritage were written out by a third party, and subscribed by the seller and purchaser in presence of other persons not specially called as witnesses. The purchaser, four months afterwards, repudiated the bargain, and the seller then caused the persons who had been present to subscribe the missive in her possession as instrumentary witnesses, and had a testing-clause added. Held that the subscription of the witnesses and the testing-clause had been competently added, and that the missive was a probative writ. Stewart v. Burns, Feb. 1, 1877, p. 247.

Testing-clause—Deed produced in Judgment.

2. Where a deed with an incomplete testing-clause was produced in a process by one of the parties who did not found upon it, held that the opposite party was entitled to have the testing-clause completed, and effect given to the deed in the process. Millar v. Birrell, Nov. 8, 1876, p. 87.

CASES DECIDED IN THE REGISTRATION APPEAL COURT.

CORRECTION OF REGISTER. Burgh Franchise—Burgh Voters Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, sec. 23—Alternative Qualification.

1. Held that the power given to the Sheriff by section 23 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, to correct mistakes in the list of voters, did not authorise him to alter the qualification of a voter from "tenant and occupant" to "joint proprietor and occupant."

Observed (per Lord Ormidale) that a person claiming to be enrolled as a voter is not entitled to found upon an alternative qualification. Anderson v. Ireland, Nov. 6, 1876, p. 1.

County Franchise—County Voters Act, 1861, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 83, sec. 44.

2. Held (distinguishing from Veitch v. Young, Oct. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 28) that the Sheriff was entitled, under the 44th section of the County Voters Act, 1861, to alter an entry in the register of voters by substituting "tenant" for "joint tenant" as the qualification of a voter, the mistake having occurred casually through the assessor mistranscribing from the valuation-roll to the register of voters. Nelson v. M'Gowan, Nov. 6, 1876, p. 3.

DEFEASIBLE TENURE. County Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Schoolmaster.

Held, upon an objection to the qualification of a schoolmaster employed by an iron company at a fixed salary, with a free house, of which he stood on the roll of voters as tenant and occupant, that though the voter's engagement as a schoolmaster was as a contract of service defeasible at the will of his employers, the objector had not, on the facts as stated by the Sheriff, discharged the onus which lay upon him, in consequence of the voter being already on the roll, of shewing that his tenure of the house was defeasible along with it. Brown v. Patterson, Nov. 13, 1876, p. 5.

SPECIAL CASE FOR APPEAL, FORM OF.

Observations (per Lord Ormidale) as to the framing of special cases for appeal to the Registration Appeal Court. Anderson v. Ireland, Nov. 6, 1876, p. 1.

CASES UNDER THE LANDS VALUATION ACTS, 1874-7.

Church.

Held that parish churches were not to be entered in the valuation-roll. Heritors of Kingoldrum, &c. Case 123, p. 1149.

Ferry.

A ferry between two counties entered in both rolls, the value being allocated. Lord Blantyre, Case 125, p. 1150.

Farm—Power to resume land for planting.

A farm was let at £3 per acre, the landlord to allow £5 for each acre he might resume for planting. The landlord having resumed and planted 11 acres, held that the tenant's rent should be entered in the roll at the rent actually paid, and that the land which had been resumed should be entered as woodland at £3 only per acre. Mitchell Innes, Case 115, p. 1147.

Farm—Abatements from Rent.

Abatements stipulated by lease not deducted, the lease not stating that the farm was in bad condition. Kinloch, Case 119, p. 1148.

Farm—Farm not in good condition.

A farm was let for nineteen years, the rent for the first two years being one-half of the rent for the remaining years. It was stated that the farm was in bad order. Held, in regard to the second year of the lease, that the rent actually paid fell to be entered in the roll. Hepburn, Case 120, p. 1148.

House.

House let to gardener by his master at £14. Objection that this was an over-valuation in order to give the gardener a vote. Locus standi of objectors, whose names were not on the valuation-roll. M'Gregor, &c. v. Menzies, Case 105, p. 1144.

Houses, Workmen's—Sublet to Workmen.

Held that the rent paid by the principal tenant was to be entered. Buchanan, Case 111, p. 1145.

Inn.

Where the tenant of an inn, let at a rent of £14, was bound to purchase her stock of ale and beer from the proprietors, who were brewers, held that the annual value was properly fixed at £20. Jerdan, Case 118, p. 1148.

Lunatic Asylum—Supported by Mortified Funds. Murray's Royal Lunatic Asylum, Case 112, p. 1145.Lunatic Asylum—Basis of Value. Barony Parochial Board, Case 122, p. 1149.Manufactory—Value of Buildings and Steam Power. Shields, Case 113, p. 1146.Market.

Held that the annual value of the area of a market belonging to a burgh was properly entered at the amount of rent paid by a tacksmen of the dues. Town of Inverness, Case 110, p. 1145. Burgh of Inverurie, Case 116, p. 1147.

Market.

The magistrates of a burgh let the right to levy rents or dues for stands in the public street of the burgh on market days. Held that the market stances, being the solum of a public street, and therefore not capable of being the subject of a lease, should not be entered in the roll. Aberdeen City Treasurer, Case 124, p. 1149.

Minerals let for thirty years.

Pitmouth buildings and engine erected by tenants. Summerlee Iron Company, Case 114, p. 1146.

CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

APPEAL. Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

1. The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act provides for appeal on case stated from the judgments of inferior Courts on points of law only. In an appeal presented under this Act, held that the question, whether, on the facts stated, a person had committed an offence under a statute by "grossly, and without reasonable excuse," failing to perform a duty therein laid upon him, was one of law, and the competency of the appeal sustained. Campbell v. Jameson, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 17.

Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, secs. 2 and 3—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 3, sub-sec. 3—Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), secs. 24, 94, and 105—Assessment.

2. A local authority having covered in a foul watercourse under the 24th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, defrayed in the first instance the cost out of funds in their hands, the produce of a general assessment under the 94th section, but afterwards assessed the cost on the individual owners of premises contributing to the pollution of the watercourse. They proceeded to recover this particular assessment from one of these owners by petition under the 105th section. Held (1) that the sum of money so sought to be recovered under the 105th section was not one the recovery of which was otherwise provided for in the Act; (2) that it was a "sum of money in the nature of a penalty" in the sense of sec. 3, sub-sec. 3, of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864; (3) that therefore the proceedings taken under the 105th section were proceedings which might have been brought under the Summary Procedure Act; and (4) that consequently the cause was one in which appeal on case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was competent. Local Authority of Selkirk v. Brodie, March 16, 1877, p. 21.
3. Held that an appeal against a conviction on the ground of insufficient authentication was not competent under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. Leishman v. Colquhoun, July 13, 1877, p. 53.

BREACH OF THE PEACE.

A was charged at common law before the Sheriff with "the crime and offence of disorderly conduct in a public street" (in a town where there was no police magistrate), "by using insulting and abusive language to or of and concerning B, who was then peaceably passing along said street, calling aloud that the said B was a thief, and using other grossly offensive words of the like nature, all in a manner calculated and intended to provoke a breach of the peace." Held that the charge was not relevant. Banks v. McLennan, Nov. 16, 1876, p. 8.

CRIME. See Breach of the Peace—Culpable Homicide—Trespass.

CULPABLE HOMICIDE. Explosion of Dynamite through negligence of Custodian—Indictment—Relevancy.

In charging the offence of culpable homicide through an explosion of dynamite in the custody of the accused, which he had culpably, and in neglect or violation of his duty, allowed to remain in an exposed place of common resort (viz., a joiner's shop in connection with a smithy), the libel set forth that the dynamite "became ignited by means of a spark from the said smithy, or by being brought into contact with some other substance, or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown, and then and there exploded." An objection was taken that the words in italics gave too great latitude to the prosecution. Held that as these words were not to be held as introducing into the minor a third species facti different from or inconsistent with the two specifically mentioned, but only as a generalisation of these two specific modes, for the purpose of giving elasticity to the indictment, the indictment was relevant.

CULPABLE HOMICIDE—Continued.

Question, whether it would be a relevant charge to libel the placing an explosive substance in a place of danger, and the fact of its subsequent explosion, without farther connecting the accused with the explosion. H. M. Advocate v. Clark, July 2, 1877, p. 48.

INDICTMENT. See Culpable Homicide.JURISDICTION. Suspension of Notice to Pave Footway—Competency.

1. The Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, sec. 22, and the General Police Act, 1850, sec. 212, laid upon the owners of property within the burgh of Forfar the obligation of making paved footways along the frontage of their properties, and empowered the Police Commissioners after the lapse of fourteen days from notice given to any such owner requiring him so to do to proceed against him by summary complaint, on which imprisonment for a limited time might follow. Notice was served upon an owner requiring him to pave the footpath in front of his property, and he at once, without waiting for a complaint to be laid against him, and disposed of by the inferior Court, brought a suspension of the notice in the High Court of Justiciary, and craved interdict against the commissioners carrying out any proceedings under the notice. The Court held that the suspension was premature, and refused to entertain it. Lowson v. Police Commissioners of Forfar, March 16, 1877, p. 35.

Civil or Criminal—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 28.

2. Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk), that the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act was intended as a test of jurisdiction only in questions of review, and did not exclude an ordinary action in the civil Courts with regard to the subject-matter of such summary complaints as were thereby rendered criminal in relation to review. Lowson v. Police Commissioners of Forfar, March 16, 1877, p. 35.

POLICE. Edinburgh Police Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. cciii.), sec. 197—Cleaning Common Stair.

Held that the obligation to clean a common stair or passage imposed by the 197th section of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848, on the occupants of houses, flats, or stories of tenements entered thereby, did not apply to the occupants of houses having their proper access by a main door from the street, although entry from the common stair or passage was possible through a passage not intended to be so used. Daish v. Paterson, Dec. 22, 1876, p. 10.

See Jurisdiction.POOR. See School.*PUBLIC HEALTH. Public Health Act, 1867, secs 24 and 94.

Held that it was no defence to an individual proprietor against a claim for a particular assessment under section 24 of the Public Health Act, that the cost of the operations in question had been defrayed in the first instance out of funds raised by general assessment under section 94, a portion of which had been already laid on him. Local Authority of Selkirk v. Brodie, March 16, 1877, p. 21.

Nuisance from foul ditch or water-course—Public Health Act, 1867 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, secs. 18 to 22)—Procedure under.

A parochial board, as the local authority of a parish, presented petitions under sections 18 to 22 of the Public Health Act, 1867, against certain proprietors of subjects abutting on a foul ditch or water-course, to have them ordained to abate the nuisance thence arising. The Sheriff-substitute found that the true authors of the nuisance could not be determined without farther and probably protracted inquiry, and that the nuisance ought to be removed without delay, and accordingly ordained the parochial board to perform the necessary works. He thereafter laid the expense incurred upon the parties complained against. Held that not having given the respondents an opportunity themselves of abating the nuisance the Sheriff could not under section 22 of the statute decern against them for the expense incurred. United Kingdom Temperance, &c., Institution v. Parochial Board of Cadder, June 14, 1877, p. 39.

PUBLIC HEALTH—Continued.

See Appeal—Jurisdiction.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, schedule (A) No. 2.

1. In an appeal against a conviction for breach of a public-house certificate, by selling exciseable liquor to a child "apparently under fourteen years of age," held that no breach is committed if the child is de facto the messenger of an adult though this is not within the knowledge of the publican and the child is served without inquiry. Graham v. Lang, Dec. 22, 1876, p. 13.

General Police Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 72), sec. 24—Publican harbouring Police Constables.

2. The General Police Act, 1857, section 24, enacts that "if any victualler, &c. shall knowingly harbour or entertain any constable appointed under this Act, or permit such constable to abide or remain in his house, &c., to the neglect of his duty, during any part of the time appointed for his being on such duty," such victualler shall be subject to a penalty. A publican was charged under this section before the Police Court of A, in so far as he did "knowingly harbour or entertain X, Y, and Z, police constables for the A district, . . . being then constables within the meaning of the said Act, or did permit the said X, Y, and Z to abide or remain in his said house, &c. to the neglect of their duty, during part of the time appointed for their being on such duty." It was proved that two of the constables were in uniform, and on duty, and the other one not; that all three did together enter the publican's premises, purchase and consume a certain quantity of liquor, but that they did not sit down, and only remained four or five minutes. The publican was convicted of the offence charged and fined in a slump sum. Conviction quashed, on the ground that it was general, in respect of harbouring, &c. all three constables, while, as regards one of these, it was clear the offence had not been committed.

Observations on the prohibition contained in the General Police Act, 1857, section 24, against publicans harbouring police constables during the hours of duty. Greig v. Stewart, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 13.

Public-Houses Act, 1862, sec. 17—Conviction—Imprisonment in Default of Payment of Penalty.

3. In a prosecution under the 17th section of the Public-Houses Act, 1862, held that the Justices had no discretion to allow any period within which payment of the penalty might be made before the term of imprisonment in default of payment began to run. Colquhoun v. Leishman, July 13, 1877, p. 53.

SCHOOL. School Fees—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 69.

Where a parochial board had refused to pay the school fees of a child, on the ground that they were not "satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees," held that an action against the parochial board for recovery of the fees could not be sustained. Callachan v. Paterson, Sept. 2, 1876, p. 1.

SCHOOL BOARD PROSECUTIONS. Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 70—Compulsory Education.

1. In a prosecution before the Sheriff against a parent under section 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it was proved that the parent, who resided in a Highland parish at a distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the nearest school, had refused to send a girl of five years that distance to school, and was unable to provide any other means of education. Held that the facts proved were not sufficient in point of law to justify the Sheriff in holding that the parent had failed, "grossly and without reasonable excuse," in the sense of the 70th section of the Act, to discharge the duty laid upon him by the 69th section of providing elementary education for his child. Campbell v. Jameson, Feb. 23, 1877, p. 17.

SCHOOL BOARD PROSECUTIONS—Continued.

Education Act, 1872, sec. 70.

2. Held that a prosecution of a parent had been improperly instituted, in respect that the school board had failed to inquire into the grounds of excuse stated by the parent, and to grant a certificate in writing, as prescribed by the 70th section of the Education Act, and conviction set aside. France v. Anderson, June 29, 1877, p. 42.

Proof—Evidence Act, 1866 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 20)—Witness.

Question, whether in a prosecution of a parent under the 70th section of the Education Act, 1872, it is competent to examine him as a witness in exculpation. France v. Anderson, June 29, 1877, p. 42.

SUMMARY PROSECUTIONS APPEALS ACT. See Appeal.

SUSPENSION OF NOTICE TO PAVE FOOTWAY. See Jurisdiction.

TRESPASS. Actor or Art and Part—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1.

Three men were charged, "all and each, or one or more of them," with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, "by entering or being in or upon a field" on the property of K in pursuit of game. It was proved that one of them had contravened the Act by entering the field without leave of the proprietor in pursuit of game, and that the other two were acting in concert with him, and were running up and down on the public turnpike road preventing the escape of the game of which he was in pursuit. Held that the two latter men were not guilty of contravening the Act libelled. Calquhoun v. Liddle and Another, Nov. 16, 1876, p. 3.

